

Positive Protestantism

A. AUGUSTUS HOBSON

Class BX4810

Book H7

Copyright N^o 1917

COPYRIGHT DEPOSIT.

Positive Protestantism

Positive Protestantism

A Concise Statement of the Historical Origins, the Positive Affirmations, and the Present Position of Protestantism

By A. Augustus Hobson, Ph. D.

Pastor, First Baptist Church Waltham, Mass.

TEXT-BOOK EDITION

The Griffith and Rowland Press

Boston
Los Angeles

Philadelphia
Chicago

St. Louis
Toronto, Can.

BX4810
H7
1917

Copyright 1917 by
GUY C. LAMSON, Secretary

Published June, 1917

✓
JUN 30 1917

©CIA 470126

no. 1.

Dedicated to
All Earnest Inquirers
After the Truth

PREFACE

THIS book grew out of a series of sermons on "Protestant Affirmations." The writer had so many requests to suggest a book which would present the origin, principles, and prospects of Protestantism that he made a diligent search for such. Inability to find a book covering this entire field led to the determination to write one. There are many histories, many theologies, many controversial works, but so far as he could discover no positive constructive statement treating all the field and showing Protestantism as it is to-day. It is the author's hope that this little book may fill the need. Many pastors may find it a useful book to have ready to give inquirers upon this subject.

Much more could have been written upon the various matters treated. The purpose of the author to meet the need of the ordinary reader rather than of experts has guided in the selection of the material. Into the Appendix has been put a considerable amount of valuable evidential material to which many thoughtful readers will wish to refer, but which could not be included in the body of the book without too greatly retarding the movement of thought. The historical statement has been made especially brief, since if longer statements are desired they are readily accessible.

Credit should be given to most of the books cited in the Book-list, but the author desires to make special mention of his indebtedness in historical discussion to T. M. Lindsay and to H. C. Vedder. In the discussion of the doctrinal matters great indebtedness to C. A. Von Hase and F. H. Foster should be acknowledged.

In this abbreviated edition the purpose to make a text-book for study classes dictated the condensation of historical matter into a single introductory chapter to take the place of Part I in the complete edition, the omission entirely of the Appendix, and the subdivision of some of the chapters. Classes using the abbreviated edition will find the footnotes referring to additional material in the complete edition very useful for supplementary study.

CONTENTS

CHAPTER	PAGE
I. PROTESTANT ORIGINS	I

PART I

PROTESTANT AFFIRMATIONS OF CHRISTIAN TRUTH

II. AGREEMENTS AND DISAGREEMENTS	13
III. SALVATION: BY FAITH OR LAW?	20
IV. SALVATION: BY FAITH OR SACRAMENT? ..	37
V. THE CHURCH AND THE MINISTRY	66
VI. RELIGIOUS AUTHORITY	83
VII. FAITH THE SUFFICIENT MEANS OF GRACE	107
VIII. ROMANIST DEFORMITIES	114
IX. WORSHIP AND FREEDOM	131

PART II

THE PRESENT PROTESTANT SITUATION

X. THE DIVISIONS OF PROTESTANTISM	151
XI. THE UNITY OF PROTESTANTISM	184
XII. THE PROSPECTS OF PROTESTANTISM ...	205
BOOK-LIST FOR REFERENCE AND STUDY.	223

CHAPTER I

PROTESTANT ORIGINS¹

THE increase in the number and aggressiveness of Roman Catholics in this country has raised anew the question as to the differences of Romanism and Protestantism. This situation and the apparently growing consideration of a reunion of Christendom demand a clear understanding of the two branches of the church. This study will undertake to set forth constructively and positively the principles and prospects of Protestantism in contrast to Romanism.

With astonishing rapidity the aim of Jesus' last command, which bade the disciples go everywhere with the gospel (Matt. 28 : 19f.), was realized in many places throughout the Roman Empire. The apostles and their companions went from place to place, preaching Jesus the Messiah and laying emphasis upon the spiritual and practical sides of religious life. The simplicity of the early Christians is shown in their conception of the Christian ceremonies as symbols of the actual inner experiencing of the Spirit of God, and in the simple democratic church organization whose only ministry consisted of deacons and pastors, the latter of whom were called either "bishop" or "elder."

¹ For a fuller yet brief statement of the historical origin of Protestantism, see the larger edition of this book, Part I.

But this simplicity was sooner or later lost under the influence of ideas which permeated the pagan, and even the Jewish, world. Everywhere saving efficacy was ascribed to religious ceremonies and special prerogatives and powers were thought to inhere in orders of priests. Under the influence of ritualism and priestism the ceremonies became indispensable channels of grace, and the ministry was made a sacerdotal order whose activity was necessary to administering grace. The office of "presbyter" (elder) or "bishop" (pastor) became two distinct offices, of which the bishop was the superior. Gradually certain bishops came to be preeminent above others. Finally, after several centuries, the bishops of Rome and of Constantinople were the supreme officials to whom deference was given. By a long process of development, through a more or less natural growth from certain historical events, by the use of a number of documents forged for the purpose of giving a semblance of legality to the claim of the bishops of Rome to supremacy over the entire church and even over temporal powers, and by an appeal to the superstitious fears of the peoples of various nations the papacy raised itself to the place of supreme power in the western half of Christendom, though the Eastern Church never has completely recognized the authority of the pope.

During the centuries of this development only one ecclesiastical institution raised itself above the papacy. This was the general council, which consisted of all the bishops of the church gathered to determine disputed matters. But even the supreme authority of a general council over the pope came to be disputed before the Reformation. As the Reformation period approached the popes were already beginning to assert their superiority to general councils.

Long before the actual Reformation certain forces had been making in that direction. In a number of nations a national consciousness had so far developed that the papacy was confronted with new forces opposed to papal absolutism. The menace of the Turk, before whom Constantinople fell in 1453, aided not a little in the political forces which were undermining the papacy. Besides, throughout the universities and, after the invention of printing, even among the masses there spread the results of the Renaissance, the awakening from the ideas and methods of thought of the Middle Ages to those of modern times. The new learning and its chief sponsors, the Humanists, greatly influenced the trend toward a reformation of the church and of the world. An additional current was the unrest of the people. A social ferment very similar to that of our own time characterized the period. The deeper current of the popular discontent, however, was religious, and this religious unrest had so far taken shape that there were actually non-conformist groups scattered here and there. Indeed, all classes were weary of the exactions of ecclesiastics and were disgusted and dismayed by the moral corruptions of the papacy and priesthood. The common opinion just before the Reformation was that the unreformed papacy was the running sore of Europe, and all contemporary writers execrated the ecclesiastical corruptions. It is but natural, therefore, that men's minds were expecting a change and were only waiting upon the leadership which would bring it about.

This leadership was to be given by Martin Luther through the Lutheran movement. Luther was a monk professor who, by the most painstaking endeavor, undertaken in the deepest religious spirit, had become convinced that salvation could be secured only through personal confidence in God and not through meeting the many ecclesiastical requirements. When Rome, greatly in need of funds, sent the priest Tetzl through Germany to sell indulgences, Luther, by posting his famous ninety-five theses on the church door at Wittenberg (Oct. 31, 1517), challenged both the practices and the teachings of the church. Rome resented his action, and attempted to deal harshly with him, but he was protected by the Elector Frederick. Rome excommunicated Luther, but he burnt the bull of excommunication publicly. When confronted with the power of the emperor, who was supporting the papacy, he stood firm, and thus challenged for conscience' sake the two mightiest rulers in the world. Luther published many books and pamphlets, and these were carried far and near and aroused the people of all lands, but especially of Germany. In them he gave forceful and clear expression to what multitudes of men had more or less vaguely been feeling and thinking, and thus struck the spark which was to fire the world. A great struggle ensued in which various parts of Germany took sides. The emperor tried by many means to carry out the pope's desires and also to compromise the matter. War was the final resort, and ended in victory for the Protestants. The result was the peace of Augsburg, which established Lutheranism as a legal religion in Germany. Lutheranism also rooted itself in Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. Thus New Testament Christianity as Luther conceived it was established.

Outside Germany in other countries the same forces which made the Lutheran movement possible worked themselves out in various forms, and came to be established in the Reformed Churches. In Switzerland the Humanist preacher Zwingli started the Protestant movement which led to the war in which he lost his life. John Calvin, next to Luther the greatest of the Reformers and the very greatest theologian of the Reformation, took up the Swiss leadership. He not only wrote the clearest statement of the theological position of Protestantism, but also made Geneva the educational center for the missionaries of all the Reformed Churches and the asylum of persecuted Protestants who came from every part of Europe. Geneva was the greatest center and force for spreading and establishing the Protestantism of the Reformed Churches. From Geneva Calvin exercised a determining influence in France, his native land, where Protestantism established itself, grew rapidly to numerical strength, was decimated by fierce and often repeated persecutions, and finally attained a legal status under Henry of Navarre by the Edict of Nantes in 1598. In Holland also Calvin's influence was paramount, for, in spite of the terrible persecutions of the infamous Duke of Alva, who turned the Netherlands into a sea of blood, Protestantism persisted, fought its way under William of Orange, and won the victory under William's son, Maurice, in 1609. In Scotland the leader was John Knox, who was exiled for his Protestant views, and spent some of his exile with Calvin at Geneva, whence he was called to Scotland to aid the Protestants in gaining an establishment. Through an alliance with England Knox saved the Protestantism of all Europe, which was endangered by the menace of the French and Spanish empires.

Calvinism spread also into some other countries. For a time it seemed about to conquer the entire English Church, but ended only in making the Puritan party, which was defeated in its effort to make the whole church Calvinistic and was driven out to make independent churches or to emigrate to America. The Anglican Church remained in many respects medieval, but did not escape some influence from Calvinism. Calvinism was successful in getting a foothold in Germany, where some Reformed churches remain to this day.

Calvinism is to be distinguished from Lutheranism in that while the latter emphasized first of all the value of faith, Calvinism stressed the doctrine of God's sovereignty; but the distinction is one of emphasis rather than of opposed beliefs. Calvinism also freed itself to greater extent than Lutheranism from the medieval type of Christianity, and so developed a more democratic form of church government than Lutheranism did, and also arrived at a conception of the Lord's Supper farther removed from that of Romanism.

Farther removed still from Romanism was the third stream of the Reformation. For a long time before the Reformation various groups had existed, espousing different views of gospel truth, and these gladly welcomed the Reformation movement and were in turn greatly increased in numbers through the influence of the entire development. Many differences of opinion obtained among these different groups which were scattered all over Europe. Yet certain principles were espoused by all and became the marks by which all Anabaptists may be distinguished. They all believed so firmly that faith is the basis of salvation that they refused to baptize except on profession of faith and insisted on re-baptizing (hence their name) all who had been christened in infancy, and this is but an example of their characteristic opposition to all priestism and sacramentalism, as is also their insistence on democratic church government. They insisted too on the authority of the Scripture as the last appeal. A third principle was that of religious liberty for all and the absolute separation of Church and State. Their fourth tenet, held quite generally, was non-resistance, with which was coupled refusal to serve as magistrates. For all of these principles they were bitterly hated by all governments and churches in Europe without exception and received from all the most terrible persecutions. Yet they spread and persisted, and have handed on their tremendous contributions through a number of modern denominations.

The influence of the Reformation did not spend itself in the three streams of Protestantism. Men who remained loyal to Rome felt the need of reform. Indeed, several attempts were made to reform the whole church, so as to include the Protestants without a schism, and these movements had in a measure the approval and cooperation of one or two of the popes. These efforts are known as the Catholic Reformation. They failed, and the work of the Counter-Reformation, which was confined to the church remaining loyal to Rome, was taken up by the Society of Jesuits, founded by Ignatius Loyola. This order was a matchless fighting machine with a mystical enthusiasm, possessing a military spirit and law, and was governed autocratically by its head. It achieved remarkable success in conserving the interests of the Roman Church. It was very influential in the Council of Trent (1545-1563), which was called by Emperor Charles to settle the whole Protestant trouble, but ended in making Rome's position stronger, especially by means of a clearer theological statement than Rome had before possessed. Both in the Catholic and in the Counter-Reformations the Inquisition, which was the punishment of spiritual offenses by physical pains and penalties and had been employed for a long time in Europe wherever State and Church acted jointly, was used with great savagery, especially in Spain and the Netherlands. Later, especially after the Council of Trent, the Index, a list of forbidden books, was used in order to keep Romanists ignorant of publications unwelcome to Rome. Previously the method was to burn all the copies of such books that could be obtained, but the invention of printing made this method ineffective. The Jesuits themselves helped to use these agencies of Romanist repression. To them must be credited the chief part in the reanimating of Rome, however much we may recognize that the society is to be condemned for some of its activities and tenets.

Quiz

1. What was the emphasis of the early church?
2. How was the early church organized?
3. What two pagan conceptions caused the departure from the simplicity of the early church?
4. How did the pope come to supremacy?
5. What were the forces which prepared for the Reformation?
6. What was the significance of Lutheranism, of Calvinism, of the Anabaptists?
7. What was the chief influence in the Counter-Reformation?

Suggestions for Further Study

1. Did Luther, Calvin, and others start "new" religions, or did they continue Christianity in purer forms?
2. The stream of the Reformation farthest removed from medieval Christianity and nearest to the modern spirit.
3. Failure of Rome to rule the entire Christian church at any period of history.
4. The worth of the Jesuits, a blessing or a curse.

Part I

Protestant Affirmations of Christian Truth

1901

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO
LIBRARY

CHAPTER II

AGREEMENTS AND DISAGREEMENTS

THE term "Protestant" may be used with greater or less strictness. Strictly speaking the Protestants were those who had a share in presenting at the Diet of Speyer (1529) the Protest which gave rise to the name. But very quickly the word had a wider use as applying to all of the followers of Luther. It is employed to-day in this country to include all Christians not adherents of the Roman or Oriental Catholic Churches. Such a wide and loose use of the term makes it well-nigh impossible to present what Protestantism teaches. Some limitation is absolutely necessary. For the present purpose the term is meant to include all communions which naturally would be included on account of their historical origin and are generally regarded as constituting the evangelical denominations.

A still further limitation is necessary. It would be possible to define Protestant teaching by an appeal to the historic written creeds of various Protestant bodies and to the writings of the leading Protestant theologians of the Reformation period, such as Luther, Melancthon, Zwingli, and Calvin, and to such later theological writers as Arminius.

Swedenborg, Jonathan Edwards, and others, who are responsible for new trends of theological thinking.¹ But many things have transpired in the world since the older Protestantism was formulated. New modes of thought and new views of the world have come from a modern spirit and method of investigation which are in part due to the Reformation and in part to other causes. Moreover, great advance has been made in the sciences that concern the Bible, theology, and the history of the church. These facts and forces have had a deep and abiding influence on Protestant Christianity. Even a Romanist writing to-day cannot address himself merely to the older Protestantism, but has quite a different situation to confront him, both within his own communion with its ultramontane exaltation of papal authority and its antagonism to Modernism, and also in the changed Protestant world. Consequently, any adequate presentation of Protestant teaching must take into account this new atmosphere.²

A development within Protestantism itself has taken place, and has shown a tendency in the direction of the principles of the Anabaptists. It is not difficult to mark the trend toward non-sacramentarian views of the ceremonies of the church, or toward the actual acceptance and even espousal of religious liberty, and the separation of Church and State. The pietistic features of the Anabaptists have also found advocates in later denominational developments. Likewise, the emphasis on a membership determined by real and personal loyalty to Christ, rather than one determined by inclusion in the state or by infant baptism, has come to be the ideal of some denominations, which still practise infant baptism or whose European connections still adhere to state churches. The consequent situation in this country is a very different one from that in which the Lutheran and Reformed communions came into being and in which the Anabaptists were regarded and treated with the greatest hatred by all others.

¹ Such is the method of the Romanist theologian Moehler, whose book "Symbolism" is by all means the best Romanist theological discussion of the differences between Protestantism and Rome. But the method reveals its weakness in the fact that a great deal of Moehler's criticism is pointless against present-day Protestantism.

² The religious and theological literature of the last decade or two will furnish ample corroboration of the present statement as a fairly accurate account of present-day Protestant affirmations of Christian teachings.

Between the modern spirit and Protestantism a certain affinity exists inasmuch as the modern world is in part a result of the Reformation. For example, the modern denial of the absoluteness of ecclesiastical authority has left its marks even within Romanism itself through the European modernist movement. The exaltation of the individual and the validity of private judgment in so many of the other affairs of life could not fail to affect religion and benefit Protestantism. Confidence in the inherent worth of life and work, issuing in a transfer of emphasis from a future to the present world, would be expected to increase the importance of ethical considerations and thus open the door of opportunity to the growing tendency of Protestant teaching to appeal to the ethical sense of men. This relation of Protestantism and the modern spirit and point of view requires the Protestant affirmations to be stated, not as they might have been set forth in the days of the Reformation, but according to the present situation.

Now the Protestant affirmations as such do not affect all Christian doctrines. As to many Christian conceptions no wide difference exists between Romanism and Protestantism. Allowing for varieties of explanation, Protestantism may be said to accept those ideas which were affirmed by the first four general councils of the early church—ideas summarized perhaps in the Apostles', the Nicene, and the Athanasian creeds. Though Protestants do not recognize the infallible or other authority of councils to determine the teachings of the Scripture, they can nevertheless hold to the essential religious ideas of the historic creeds while insisting that their statements must be adjusted to the modern world and its modes of thought.

Among the conceptions upon which agreement is to be had is one of particular importance for this discussion because it leads directly to the consideration of differences, namely, the conception that man is in deep need of God, and without him cannot possibly realize the fullest life here and hereafter. Romanist and Protestant theologians have discussed with most minute theological refinements the theories underlying this statement of man's need for God and man's moral and religious impotence without God. But for the purposes of a practical understanding of the Christian gospel it is not necessary to enter into these discussions. Only the matters of main importance need be set forth. These concern the meeting of man's need by God.

The fundamental differences are but two, provided that the theological discussion of the relation of justification and sanctification is put aside. It is sufficient for practical religious purposes to state that the points of difference in that discussion have quite entirely to do with the theological definition of terms and the delimiting of psychological religious processes. Since both Romanist and Protestant theologians hold that God's true children are both justified and sanctified by him, it is not of the greatest importance whether these terms refer to an identical process or whether justification is to be considered a separate act of God followed by the process of sanctification. The ethical side of the argument as presented by such a Romanist as Moehler³ would be entirely in accord with modern Protestant views of justification. This fact would of itself be sufficient warrant for setting aside the discussion of the doctrine of justification. And again, since such an argument as Moehler's comes later to rest entirely upon the Romanist view of the sacraments as the source of the grace which justifies and sanctifies, all that is pertinent can be considered in connection with the discussion of one of the main differences between Protestantism and Romanism.

³ See Moehler's "Symbolism" (translated by J. B. Robertson, London, 1906) in the discussion of Justification.

One of the two remaining differences concerns the function and authority of the church. The other affects the conception of the method by which God's grace is brought to the saving of men. Even here the difference lies in the realm of the explanation of certain religious facts and phenomena which both Romanists and Protestants recognize; as, for example, the fact that Jesus Christ is Saviour and Lord through whom men come to God. The importance of the differences lies in the fact that these explanations are made regulative of religious life and so become the determining elements of religion. They must, therefore, be thoroughly understood. Historically Luther came first to the question of the method of salvation and only to the other question of the church and its authority after it had been inevitably raised by his earlier statements and activities. Our course of thought will follow this order, but will subdivide the consideration of the church into three studies, and will approach the other question from two points of view, since the Protestant conception of the method of salvation contrasts with two distinct view-points held by Romanism. One of these is legalism, or the securing of salvation by conforming to the requirements of a definitely stated set of laws. The other is sacramentalism, or salvation mediated through a priestly order possessing special divine powers and by divinely appointed ceremonies which are the only vehicle of the grace of God that enables men to come unto him and to live a life of which he approves. Each of these contrasts will be discussed in successive chapters. Then will be presented in three chapters the Protestant conception of the church's function, religious authority, and the channel of grace, in contradistinction to the Romanist ideas.

Inevitably Protestant principles lead to a condemnation of certain elements of Romanism as useless excrescences. They must also lead to evaluating as valid certain conceptions and applications occasioned by Christianity's contact with civilization as a whole. These condemnations and evaluations will also be noted in two special chapters as negative and positive implications of Protestantism.

Quiz

1. What does the term "Protestant" mean? 2. Who are Protestants? 3. What is the situation which makes a modern statement of Protestantism necessary? 4. How far do Protestantism and Romanism agree? 5. What are the three differences between Protestantism and Romanism? 6. Which two are of practical religious importance?

CHAPTER III

SALVATION: BY FAITH OR LAW?

ONE of the world-old religious questions is that which troubled Luther, "How can a man be saved?" Christianity conceives that all men are sinful except so far as they are saved from that condition by God, who not only rescues men from the menacing results of their sins, but also saves them from the very grip of the tendency to sin, that is, makes them capable of resisting evil and accomplishing a Christian life. Men are saved to a life with God and to all that such a life involves, both here and hereafter. Nothing in Protestantism or Romanism disagrees essentially with these statements. The important difference arises as to the basis on which God is conceived as proceeding to save men and the means by which he cooperates with them in the achievement of a Christian life.

Protestantism teaches that God is willing to forgive sin in view of men's faith and to treat all repentant men as a father treats a repentant child. Salvation is a two-sided process in which God acts with the really fundamental power and man acts out of the really necessary and potential motives. The essential attitude of men is their faith, that is, their devoted reliance on God's readiness to save. A man has only to recognize his sinfulness and need of God, to trust confidently in God and his power and willingness to save, to repudiate sin, and to choose God's standard of life. When such an attitude is taken through faith in Jesus the Christ, who revealed God and his gospel, then God is willing to disregard a man's lack of an actually complete righteous life and to cooperate through personal communion with the man in the achievement of salvation. In other words, a man comes into communion with God and continues in that relation through his devoted reliance on God. This sharing in God's life here gives assurance of life hereafter.

This is plainly the conception which is presented in the New Testament, and directly to the New Testament Protestantism sends every inquirer after the truth. In the parable of the Prodigal Son Jesus presents God's fatherly willingness to forgive sinners in contrast to the legalistic conceptions of the Pharisees, for the father in the parable, who is overjoyed to regain a lost son, is a figure of God. Most significant is the omission of reference to any other condition of accepting the son than that of the repentant, submissive, and trusting attitude displayed by the prodigal. Indeed, Jesus' constant use of the name "Father" for God is a supreme emphasis on this conception, which contrasted so strongly with the popularly current legalistic and ceremonial ideas of his time. To the plain teaching of this parable may be added the implication of Jesus' description of the last great judgment, in which he gives his only definition, intended as such, of the condition of entrance into the heavenly kingdom. In this description the sheep are separated from the goats not on a theological, ceremonial, or legalistic basis, but on the simple ground that the sheep by their daily life in its commonest affairs displayed an attitude toward the King which leads him to count them as his own. The central importance of the inner disposition to loyal service of the King is made still plainer in the Sermon on the Mount. Though denying any intention of destroying the law and asserting that he has come to fulfil the law's meaning, Jesus contrasts (Matt. 5) his understanding of the law with that of the scribes and Pharisees. He makes the point of the contrast turn precisely upon the idea that the inner motive is what determines in the sight of God the ultimate significance of any acts with which the law deals. The condition upon which God judges men favorably, then, is such an inward attitude as that of the returning prodigal or the giver of a cup of cold water. The case of the woman taken in adultery is also pertinent. Here is one actually caught in open violation of a law of first importance. Yet, because of the very attitude which the woman took in her shame, Jesus said: "Neither do I condemn thee; go, and sin no more." Forgiveness was granted in view of her shown repentance and on condition that she go forth with the purpose to live better. The inner attitude thus referred to is what Protestantism calls faith.

Paul continued Jesus' teaching, and brings faith into even greater contrast with the law as a means of securing salvation. "Yet knowing that man is not justified by the works of the law, but through faith in Jesus Christ, even we believed in Christ Jesus, that we might be justified by faith in Christ, and not by works of the law; for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified" (Gal. 2 : 16). This statement is perfectly plain, since Paul means by the word "justified" to indicate that state in which a man is declared or regarded as no longer under condemnation for his lack of actual righteousness. The same teaching is plainly stated also in the following: "Now apart from the law, a righteousness of God (i. e., a way of righteousness approved by God) hath been manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets; even the righteousness of God through faith in Jesus Christ unto all them that believe; for there is no distinction; for all have sinned, and fall short of the glory¹ of God; being justified freely by his grace² through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: whom God set forth to be a propitiation, through faith, in his blood, to show his righteousness because of the passing over of sins done aforetime, in the forbearance of God; for the showing, I say, of his righteousness at this present season: that he might himself be just, and the justifier of him that hath faith in Jesus" (Rom. 3 : 21-26). Certainly nothing further need be quoted from the many passages in Paul's letters to show that he regarded faith in Jesus as the basis on which God is willing to deal with his sinful children.

¹ That is, of winning God's approval.

² That is, without cost to the man justified.

But this simple and plain teaching of the New Testament is not sufficient for Romanism. It holds that the first step of the estranged man in coming again into right relations with God is the formal intellectual acceptance of the church's dogmatic teachings; then, that renewal of life comes through the application of the sacraments, especially baptism, which washes away the man's original sin; and further, that the continuance in and fuller realization of this life is possible only through the sacraments and the merit attained by meeting the requirements or laws of the church. The contrast of faith and sacraments as means of salvation is to be discussed in the next chapter, that of faith and law here. But it must be constantly remembered that, though for the sake of clarity we treat Romanist sacramental and legalistic ideas separately, they frequently merge in Romanist thought and are often connected with the same religious practices as, for example, the penalties in penance are both legalistic and sacramental.

Rome insists that works are meritorious. According to this conception certain deeds done because of the command or advice of the church have a value for salvation. Such deeds are prayers, fasts, gifts for church building and the like, on up to monastic vows and practices.³ These deeds do not depend for their value upon the inner Christian disposition, but possess saving worth without it. By performing them one may secure a sort of bank credit of meritoriousness which may be cashed in actual saving merit from the infinite treasury laid up by Christ. The article "Merit" in the Catholic Encyclopedia says: "It is a defined article of the Catholic Faith that man in, before, and after justification derives his whole capability of meriting and satisfying, as well as his actual merits and satisfactions, solely from the infinite treasure of merits which Christ gained for us on the cross." This mechanical and, so to speak, commercial conception is carried so far that it is believed men may do more than is required of them and so gain a surplus of merits which may be transferred to some one else in more need of them, whether the person be living or in purgatory. Deeds securing this surplus are works of supererogation. With reference to these the article just quoted says: "The possibility of this transferal rests on the fact that the residual punishments for sin are in the nature of a debt which may be legitimately paid to the creditor and thereby canceled, not only by the debtor himself, but also by a friend of the debtor." No legalistic conception of the Pharisees was more mechanical than this teaching of Romanism, and none was quite so commercial and utterly lacking in ethical foundation.⁴

³ The ethical value of Moehler's argument concerning the relation of good works to justification was possible for him chiefly because he distinctly set outside of his discussion all reference to "ecclesiastical ceremonies, external rites, and the like" (p. 157), and confined his consideration entirely to the good works required by Christian ethical teachings. He does not in that argument address himself to that phase of the question which Protestant discussions treat and which was the heart of Luther's controversy in this matter. It is against the saving efficacy of such meritorious works as those excluded by Moehler that the Protestant teaching is directed, and not against the ethical value and necessity of those acts included in a practical Christian life based on faith.

Protestantism urges against the Romanist legalistic conception several convincing objections. In view of the New Testament, Protestantism regards it as self-evident that mere external, mechanical deeds, without the inner disposition to do them, can have no significance for religion and morals. Even if the Scripture is disregarded, it is equally self-evident to a heart and mind of real piety, since morality is based in personal volition, that such a thing as buying indulgences cannot help in a moral matter, even when the buyer has given formal intellectual assent to the dogmas of the church. Protestantism is willing to rest its case with the appeal to the moral and religious sense of men who have read the New Testament with a desire to find God.

The tendency of the practice of meritorious works to issue in superstition is so inherent that the Council of Trent, after admonishing all bishops to give instruction concerning the veneration and invocation of saints, the honor to be paid relics, and the use of images, found it necessary to warn against the connected abuses and used with reference to these things such terms as "superstition," "filthy lucre," "lasciviousness," "revelings and drunkenness," and "luxury and wantonness." As Harnack, the great German historian, says: "Since the end of the second century there has always been a kind of side-religion, a subterranean religion of the second order, varying according to the differences of the peoples, but everywhere alike in its gross superstitions, its naive docetism, its dualism and polytheism. . . It is the worship of angels (demigods) and demons, the high valuation of pictures, relics, and amulets, a weaker or stronger enthusiasm for the severest asceticism (whence also dualistic conceptions), and the anxious observance of certain words, signs, rites, ceremonies, places, and times which are regarded as holy." History shows, and the Council of Trent implicitly admits, that the practice of meritorious works inevitably runs off into this side-religion. It is in part on this account that Protestantism rejects the whole conception of meritorious works.

⁴ See larger edition, Appendix, Note 2, for Romanist modifications of this idea.

Supererogation, a development from the Romanist doctrine of good works, is especially offensive to the moral sense. Rome teaches that it is possible to do more than one's required duty to God and thus to win, especially through monastic vows, a surplus of merit which may be transferred to others.

This teaching is supposed to be derived from the incident of Jesus and the rich young man. (Matt. 19 : 16-23.) But Jesus merely presented here the ideal of positive achievement in contrast to mere negative conformity to the law, and tested the relative devotion of the young man to his riches and to the work of cooperating in Jesus' itinerant evangelism in which the care of rich possessions would have been a positive hindrance to the young man's effectiveness. In this incident none but the possessor of such a special interpreting power as Rome claims could ever find the doctrine of works of supererogation. Protestantism is willing to leave the interpretation to ordinary intelligence. But it urges in addition to this lack of real scriptural support that a transfer of moral values is quite outside the realm of real morality, which is the sphere of personal volitions. Moral worth is not a commodity to be dispensed on the presentation of a due bill, so to speak, on behalf of some one else. Protestantism also maintains that one can never do more than his full duty to God. However nearly men approach perfection, they have only drawn near to full realization of their own duty to God. How, then, can one do more than enough and merit surplus credit? Consequently, Protestantism repudiates meritorious works because of this connected idea of supererogation.⁵

⁵ For the actual place of supererogatory ideas in the New Testament time and later, see Smith, Burton and Smith, "Biblical Ideas of Atonement," pp. 76-90.

Even were supererogation valid, there is no intelligent basis for holding that monastic vows of poverty, celibacy, and obedience could accomplish a surplus of merit with God. Poverty in itself is no virtue, and in the better monastic ideal is simply a means to unhampered religious devotion. In view of the inevitable accumulation of riches on the part of the monasteries, monastic poverty seems a very strange realization of this ideal. Moreover, celibacy is certainly not a higher ideal for human beings than fatherhood and motherhood, unless the sex relation is inherently evil and the task of peopling the world unacceptable to God. Again, how is obedience to an ecclesiastical official an addition to the fulfilling of the whole duty to God? Even if such obedience is regarded as a divinely appointed duty, it cannot for that very reason be conceived as outside of the required duty to God. Accordingly, monastic vows offer no opportunity for extra credit with God, and this conclusion strengthens the Protestant contention.

But the fundamental reason why Protestants reject the teaching concerning good works is that it is of a piece with the legalistic conception of the scribes and Pharisees which both Jesus and Paul attacked so vigorously. The Pharisees conceived that salvation was to be attained by understanding and applying the law—in their case the Old Testament law—according to the authoritative interpretations and definitions of the fathers (noted rabbis).

If one failed to secure sufficient credit by punctilious observance of the law thus interpreted, he could fall back on his Abrahamic descent for a privileged treatment by God. So Romanism conceives that a man must obey the requirements and the advice of the church in accordance with the authoritative tradition of the Church Fathers. If one lacks power to achieve sufficient merit, one falls back upon the sacramental grace dispensed by the church.

The two systems have the same appeal to an external authority and the same subtle hair-splitting refinements of definitions. These two features are both illustrated by the distinction made between venial sins, which are easily pardoned, and mortal sins, which are forgiven with greater difficulty. Another distinction is made in the terms "latria," worship of God, "dulia" (literally service), adoration of the saints, and "hyperdulia," superadoration of Mary. Psychologically and practically such distinctions are impossible, and reflect only a difference in words, not in the actual attitudes of worship. According to Coppens, the first law of the church requires attendance at mass on Sunday. Application of this law necessitates defining what constitutes attendance, and so how late one may arrive at mass and still comply with the law. Coppens declares (p. 321) it to be a mortal sin "to miss the elevation, or communion, or to arrive after the offertory." Again, the Roman Missal refers to the "defects" occurring in the celebration of the mass. A rule given there requires the swallowing of the wine even if a fly or spider has fallen into it, and another regulation makes it necessary for the priest, who may have vomited the bread and wine, to reswallow the same if the elements can be distinguished in the vomit. All of this defining is in the spirit of the pharisaic rabbis. The two systems are also alike in the self-righteousness which they engender, for Romanists must believe that they are the privileged of God since salvation comes only through Rome.

Jesus' condemnation of such legalism is particularly virile and incisive. In the Sermon on the Mount he contrasted his conception of the internal nature of righteousness with pharisaic conformity to the traditional oral law. Elsewhere, immediately after a condemnation of pharisaic interpretative obscuring of the law, Jesus said the Pharisees would compass sea and land to make one proselyte and then would make him twofold more a son of hell than they themselves were. (Matt. 23 : 15.) A still more scathing condemnation is given in the utterance: "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye tithe mint and anise and cummin, and have left undone the weightier matters of the law, justice, mercy, and faith: but these ye ought to have done, and not to have left the other undone" (Matt. 23 : 23). Recognizing the proper function of the law, Jesus put the heart of its observance in the inner attitude of justice, mercy, and faith. In the incident of the Pharisee and the publican there is also a specially apt condemnation of legalism and the self-righteousness which flows from it. (Luke 18 : 10-14.)⁶ Nothing is plainer in the New Testament than this condemnation by Jesus of pharisaic legalism which is so similar to that of Roman Catholicism.

Paul extensively condemns legalism in his teaching that salvation comes apart from the law.⁷ Two incidents from the New Testament give this teaching special significance for the present discussion. When certain self-appointed guardians of Jewish Christianity came down from Jerusalem to Antioch, where the church included a considerable number of Gentiles, they raised the question of the validity of a Jew's partaking of the Lord's Supper with an uncircumcised man. It was unlawful for a Jew to eat with such. Peter had been at Antioch, and had been following the custom of the church without hesitation. But now, for fear of the Judaizing brethren from Jerusalem, he cowardly refused to eat. But Paul at once opposed Peter to his face, as he tells us, and asserted that obedience to the law was not necessary as an addition to faith as a basis for coming into and maintaining right relations with God. Later, at a friendly conference in Jerusalem, where James and Peter and Paul were present, a compromise was agreed upon whereby Paul was to continue his evangelization among the Gentiles while the Jewish regions of the world were to be left to the evangelizing efforts of Peter and those others who more or less desired to perpetuate legalistic ideas and practices. The Judaistic Christianity of these latter disappeared after a short period simply because it was so completely out of harmony with the essential teaching of Christ. Paul's gospel, agreeing with the teaching of Jesus, remained dominant (even Peter was afterward completely won to it) until a new legalism crept into the church through the doctrine of meritorious works. Accordingly, it is plain that Paul condemned legalism, and that too in spite of Peter, by whom Rome sets so great store.

⁶ Compare this with the following Romanist statement, "I chastise myself, but I count the strokes and am proud of their number" (Bishop Wittman, quoted by Von Hase, p. 33).

⁷ See above, pp. 23f.

This New Testament condemnation and the other objections urged above are conclusive for the rejection of Romanist legalism. But Protestantism does not rest in mere rejection, for it proceeds to show the real relation of good works to faith. In order to estimate adequately this relation the nature of faith must be understood. A difference in the definition of faith is partly, though not entirely, responsible for the differences between the Protestant and Romanist conceptions. According to Romanism, faith is the intellectual acceptance as true of what the church declares to be true.⁸ Moehler says that "recognition of the truths revealed in Christ . . . is faith in the ordinary Catholic sense" (p. 137). The authoritative teaching of the Roman Church compels such a statement, though the more scriptural conception of faith was not without expression in the medieval times.

⁸ For fuller statements of Romanists, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 3.

Protestantism considers faith to be much more than an assent to dogmas. In the usage of the New Testament "faith" has an intellectual element, but the chief feature of it is volitional. Faith involves acting on the basis of what one believes to be true. It is the choice of God's way in view of the truths in which one can believe and on the basis of which he is willing to act, and this choice arises out of confidence in God and in the truth concerning him. This choice and confidence imply love to God and to his children, our fellow men (Gal. 5 : 6), and so a willingness to turn away from all that is opposed to God according to one's conscience. Faith is the attitude of the whole being toward God which, because of confidence in God and in the revelation of him in Christ, makes men willing to live for him. A man may have such faith and thus be acceptable to God even though his intellectual conception may be only partially true or may differ from that of others who have faith.

Of such faith good works, according to Protestantism, are both the expression and the test. As the life of the seed develops according to its kind, so unfolds the life of faith. Jesus' word is that we know the tree by its fruits. Thus we know faith by its expression in good deeds, and when we have the right kind of faith we may be sure of a right kind of life. Good fruit does not make a tree good, but a good tree does make good fruit, and good fruit is always a sign of a good tree. Good works do not make a man good, but good deeds reveal that a man has the good attitude of life, and a man with real faith will do good works as naturally as a good tree produces good fruit. "The good man out of his good treasure bringeth forth good things, for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh" (Matt. 12 : 34f., quoted here with a change of order). Such is the Protestant teaching over against the external, mechanical, and unethical conception of Romanism, that mere acts may have a merit aside from the moral disposition from which they arise.

There are thus two main thoughts of Protestantism which are fundamental and which constitute its strength and treasure at this point. One is the conviction that religion is essentially a steadfast temper of soul rooted in childlike trust in God. The other is the conviction that this childlike trust is inseparably bound up with the plain, simple principle that the moral life is the true and inevitable expression and test of the trust. These convictions Protestants base on Scripture and reason.

Quiz

1. What is the main teaching of Protestantism as to the basis of salvation? 2. What three important passages show Jesus' teachings? 3. What was Paul's teaching? 4. What is the main Romanist teaching? 5. How does Romanism conceive the meritoriousness of works? 6. What is the objection by Protestantism on the basis of lack of Scripture and superstitious developments? 7. On the basis of unjustifiableness of supererogation? 8. On the basis of the similarity of Romanism to pharisaism? 9. How did Jesus condemn legalism? 10. What was Paul's condemnation of legalism? 11. What is the Romanist conception of faith? 12. What is the Protestant conception of faith? 13. What is the Protestant estimate of good works?

Suggestions for Further Study

1. The relation of Romanist "good works" and concrete moral living. 2. The relation of faith as Protestants conceive it and the necessity of learning in order to believe the truth. 3. What instances of Romanist legalistic practices have come under your personal observation?

CHAPTER IV

SALVATION : BY FAITH OR SACRAMENT ?

THE central doctrine of Protestantism; salvation by faith, comes into contrast with the sacramental as well as the legalistic element of Romanism.

Even in the Old Testament the inwardness of the basis of the relation to God was set forth. The new covenant¹ forecasted by Jeremiah is not to be written on slabs of stone like the tablets of the Mosaic covenant. "I will put my law in their inward parts, and in their heart I will write it; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people" (Jer. 31 : 33). This inwardness of the law is pertinent in regard to the Protestant rejection of legalism, but it has even more significance for the consideration of sacramentalism. It was simply one element in that general conception of the necessarily internal basis of the religious life which was characteristic of the prophets and led them to reject such ceremonialism as was externally conceived and practised in the Old Testament time. (Micah 6 : 6-8.)

Jesus himself condemned ceremonialism in his

¹ The use of the term "new covenant" by Jesus, and the applying of it by him and all Christians to the New Testament gospel, is significant.

declaration that religious worth depended on inward condition and not on external conformity to required ceremonies. (Matt. 23 : 25; and cf. Luke 11 : 37-41.) Paul very distinctly repudiated an outward ceremonialism. "For he is not a Jew who is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision which is outward in the flesh; but he is a Jew who is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God" (Rom. 2 : 28f.). This brief but plain statement may be corroborated by many other passages. Clearly the New Testament teachers, as well as the Old Testament prophets, rejected the idea of the saving efficacy of ceremonies.²

This scriptural repudiation of ceremonialism Protestantism applies to the Romanist conception of the nature and function of the sacraments, though it must be said that the degree of this application has differed in the hands of various Protestant communions according to the relative distance of their removal from the medieval ideas of Romanism. Essentially, however, in spite of the differences in denominational explanations of the use of the sacraments, Protestantism, because of its central emphasis upon faith and its inwardness, has been committed by logic, if not by creed and practice, to the purely spiritual conception of the Christian ceremonies as distinct from a magical, external, and mechanical view. Gradually the more spiritual idea has been displacing the residue of medievalism, at least among the bulk of Protestants in this country.

² For the protest against the supposition of intrinsic saving value in sacrifice as displayed in the non-canonical literature before and in the New Testament times, see Smith, Burton and Smith, "Biblical Ideas of Atonement," p. 75.

The Romanist doctrine as to the sacraments has two elements which the Protestant doctrine as to faith makes impossible to hold as valid. One element is the idea that the performance of a sacramental ceremony in and of itself conveys God's grace without reference to the inner attitude of the worshiper. The Roman Catechism defines sacrament as "the visible sign of an invisible grace, instituted for our justification." But it is not a mere sign, for, according to the Council of Trent, "grace is given through the sacraments, so far as God's part is concerned, always and to all men," and "by the sacraments of the new law grace is conferred through the act itself." This is taught by Thomas Aquinas, the greatest of all the Romanist theologians, and also by Duns Scotus, who said: "Grace is conferred from the very fact that the work, namely, the sacrament, is exhibited, unless the obstacle of mortal sin prevents; so that besides the exhibition of the sign openly exhibited no good motion of the heart is required in him who receives it."³ Protestantism rejects this external, mechanical, and magical conception.

The second objectionable feature of the Romanist

³ Quoted by Von Hase and Foster. See further Cardinal Gibbons, "Faith of Our Fathers," p. 304.

doctrine is the proposition that the efficacy of the sacraments depends upon the intention of the priest. According to this proposition a valid sacrament has been performed only if the priest meant the performance to convey grace.⁴ Certainly the Scriptures give no hint of authority for the idea that any man can prevent those who seek God from really finding him or can by an unannounced purpose destroy the undoubted value of participating sincerely in the Christian ceremonies. Protestantism sees in the doctrine of intention only evidence of the mechanical magic of the Romanist system.

Protestant opposition to sacramentalism is really a positive affirmation of the place which faith has in religion. Protestantism as well as Romanism insists that spiritual help is to be secured by participation in religious ceremonies. But Protestant teaching stands on the scriptural position that God's grace can be dispensed only to those who through faith are receptive toward his influences, and conceives that faith is the hand with which man receives the blessing of God. Such a view makes plain that there can be no real and saving relation between God and man into which man does not voluntarily enter, and it commends itself at once to a reasonable and pious mind.

One other feature of the general Protestant attitude toward the sacraments is its refusal to recognize the number as seven. No number of divinely approved Christian ceremonies is mentioned in the Scripture. The number of sacraments named by Church Fathers has varied from two to twelve. Romanism has fixed arbitrarily on the number seven. Thus it has omitted some ceremonies, such as foot-washing, which has a far better scriptural claim to recognition than several of the Romanist sacraments, and is annually observed at Rome itself as a holy ceremony. Certainly there is no scriptural or other evidence of an institution of all these seven ceremonies by Jesus, and yet, according to Rome, a sacrament to be such must have been instituted by Christ. Only two, baptism and the Lord's Supper, were so instituted in any sense whatsoever. These are accepted as of primary and obligatory importance by Protestants, and have been quite universally adopted by all Christians of every age who have employed any recognized ceremonies.⁵ Protestants employ other ceremonies, but these two are regarded as preeminent and obligatory because of their institution by Christ, because of their universal observance by Christians, and because of their inherent significance.

⁴ See larger edition, Appendix, Note 4, for official Romanist statement of the doctrine of intention.

Though the number of ceremonies instituted and commanded by Christ is thus only two, it is necessary, for understanding the differences of Protestant and Romanist teaching, not only to present the ⁵ For some evidential facts, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 5.

Protestant view of these two, but also to consider the Protestant position with reference to the other ceremonies regarded by Rome as sacraments.

The Roman Catechism says baptism is "the sacrament of regeneration through water in the word." Cardinal Gibbons declares,⁶ "Baptism washes away original sin and also actual sins from the adult who may have contracted them." Hence, baptism is necessary for salvation, although theoretically the purpose to be baptized is sufficient, provided realization is hindered by some absolutely unavoidable obstacle. If the ceremony is performed with "intention" and according to the proper formula, its validity is not affected by the performer being a heretic, a woman, a Jew, or a Saracen, or by the goodness or the evil of the administrator, since grace is conveyed by the mere act.⁷

Protestantism affirms that faith secures forgiveness of sins and that baptism is merely the outward sign of what faith accomplishes. It insists, therefore, when true to its fundamental position, that baptism is not necessary to salvation, but should be observed because of Christ's command and because of the fitness of this ceremony as the symbol of that cleansing from sin and of that union with Christ which faith effects at the beginning of the Christian life. However, there is a difference of conception and practice among Protestants as to the subjects and form of baptism.

⁶ See "Faith of Our Fathers," p. 315. Compare also Coppens, pp. 224f.

⁷ For Romanists' views as to the necessity of baptism, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 6.

The relation of the fundamental Protestant principle to infant baptism is stated by the Lutheran scholar Von Hase when he says, "The piece of Catholicism in the heart of the Protestant Church is infant baptism, in accordance with its significance taken over direct from the Catholic Church, as effecting ipso facto regeneration."⁸ It is also recognized by the Romanist theologian, Moehler, who asks with reference to infant baptism, "If it is only by virtue of faith that sacrament acts, of what value can it be to an unconscious child?" Some Protestant branches have not been able to relate their fundamental conception thus to infant baptism. Even some who see the relation justify the practice, after repudiating the magical efficacy of baptism, by regarding it as a ceremony for parental consecration through Christian love of the lives of little ones to God's church. The analogy to circumcision of the Old Testament dispensation is sometimes cited. But the magical conception more or less persistently connects itself with the practice.

The Protestants who refuse⁹ to baptize infants hold that there is no evidence that the New Testament church knew anything of infant baptism,¹⁰ but that, on the other hand, the only specific cases of baptism mentioned in the New Testament require the supposition that the baptized had personal faith. They also consider that the fundamental teaching of the New Testament as to faith, which Protestantism has made its primary teaching, renders absurd the practice of infant baptism, and that the more complete application of the Protestant principle by the rejection of it not only saves Protestantism from inconsistency, but also completely repudiates the magical conception underlying infant baptism which is so essentially characteristic of Romanism. This repudiation is the more significant since, according to these Antipedobaptists, the change from the New Testament conception and practice was due to the belief that baptism was necessary to salvation, and to the consequent desire of parents to make sure that their children would not be lost if they died before coming to an age when personal faith was possible. Thus the repudiation leads to the rejection of the inhuman and unchristian idea that unbaptized children will be forever lost, and to the escape from the superstition connected with this idea. But this rejection is not meant to imply that dedication of children to God and Christianity is improper, but only a refusal to use for the purpose of ceremonial dedication the New Testament ceremony of baptism which was instituted for quite another function, namely, as the sign of the beginning, through faith, of the Christian life and entrance into the Christian community.

⁸ For a fuller quotation from Von Hase, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 7.

⁹ In view of the history of the opposition to infant baptism on one ground or another, which goes back certainly as far as Tertullian, the remark of Coppens (p. 224) that infant baptism was not assailed until the sixteenth century shows almost an incredible ignorance. See A. H., Newman, "History of Anti-Pedobaptism."

¹⁰ Compare larger edition, Appendix, Note 7.

There is also a difference among Protestants as to the form of baptism. The majority use affusion or sprinkling, some permit immersion while preferring sprinkling, and others insist that immersion is the only proper form. Those insisting on immersion hold that such was the form in the New Testament time, and the tendency of modern scholarship of all denominations is to grant this contention.¹¹ Emphasis is laid upon the many indications of the early practice of immersion, such as the existence of ancient baptisteries; upon the fact that the Eastern Church has never used any other form of baptism than immersion; and upon the further fact that the first conciliar decision raising affusion or sprinkling to a place of equality with immersion was a decree of the Council of Ravenna (1311), and this affected only a single province and not the whole Western Church. From such facts it is concluded that the original custom of the church was immersion. It is also believed that the change from immersion was occasioned by the fear that such persons as the sick, who were unable to be immersed, would be lost, since they must be baptized to be saved. Such clinic baptism gradually led, after a considerable time, through considerations of convenience, to greater and greater prevalence of sprinkling or affusion. Consequently, insistence on immersion is a protest against the change and the magical sacramental view which led to the change. Finally, it is held that immersion alone fitly symbolizes that burial with Christ in baptism to which the New Testament refers. (Rom. 6 : 4.) When the force of these considerations is in any measure granted by those who employ affusion, it is insisted that in a matter of form the New Testament does not need to be followed; but reply is made to this by the contention that it is important to take the New Testament as guide in every possible way and to emphasize by protest the fundamental Protestant conception of the efficacy of faith as against an ecclesiastical ceremonialism.

¹¹ It is interesting to note the statement of the Jesuit Coppens (p. 223): "In fact, immersion was the most usual manner during the first fourteen centuries." See also article "Baptism" in the International Encyclopedia, and Henry S. Burrage, "The Act of Baptism."

As in baptism, so in confirmation, the Romanist and Protestant conceptions disagree. Romanism regards confirmation as a sacrament which of itself conveys grace. The only use of it consonant with the Protestant principles is that which views the ceremony as the sign of the personal faith in Christ which the participator possesses. Not all Protestants use the ceremony, for those bodies which baptize only on profession of faith have no need of it. Confirmation arose only after infant baptism had become general. In the New Testament time baptism was the ceremony of professing faith in Christ and of entering the Christian community. Infant baptism changed the significance of baptism, and left the church without a ceremony to mark personal acceptance of Christ and entrance into the community of Christians. The need was filled by the creation of the rite of confirmation.¹² Those Protestant bodies which do not use confirmation and yet practise infant baptism, have their own varied but similar modes of receiving people into church-membership; and all these modes are only substitutes for baptism as employed in the New Testament time.

According to Romanism, while baptism washes away sin, the grace of God conveyed by baptism is lost through every mortal sin and must be restored through the sacrament of penance. This consists in repentance leading to confession, or relating to a priest all one's mortal sins—venial sins may but do not have to be confessed—and receiving absolution from the priest. He acts as a judge, and absolves with the expectation of the performance by the sinner of certain deeds, such as almsgiving, prayers, and fasts, which are known as "penances" or "satisfactions." The article on "Penance" in the Catholic Encyclopedia, says: "The absolution given by the priest . . . remits both the guilt and the eternal punishment of mortal sin. There remains, however, some indebtedness to Divine justice which must be canceled here or hereafter."

¹² Thus the Episcopalian church historian Allen ("Christian Institutions," pp. 404f.) says that confirmation now serves the purpose for which New Testament baptism was used,

Thus God is conceived as only partially forgiving sin and as requiring still some payment to be met by temporal punishment¹³ inflicted in "penances." If this payment is unmet at death, it must be suffered in purgatory. Indulgences may be issued, mitigating or abolishing these "penances" or substituting lighter penalties, and indulgences may even apply to the temporal punishment to be met hereafter in purgatory.

Scriptural ground for these elements of the sacrament of penance is claimed by Romanism in the saying of Jesus: "Receive ye the Holy Spirit: whose soever sins ye forgive, they are forgiven unto them; whose soever sins ye retain, they shall be retained" (John 20 : 22f.). But in these words or their context there is no institution of a sacrament, no reference to auricular confession, and no indication of a judicial authority to inflict penalties. On the other hand, the right to declare sins forgiven on the basis of God's promises, which this passage gives, is conferred by Jesus on the entire church (Matt. 16 : 19; 18 : 18), and consequently the right is not confined even to the apostles alone, much less to the Roman priesthood.¹⁴

¹³ It would seem from statements of Romanist teachers that "temporal punishment" is to be distinguished from "eternal punishment" in being temporary instead of everlasting; in being less grievous than "eternal punishment," though the greater gravity is not defined, but is left to the imagination; and in covering only that indebtedness to God remaining after eternal guilt and punishment have been wiped out by sacramental grace.

¹⁴ For the use of the word "penance" in the Douai English Version of the Bible, which is the approved Catholic version for use in this country, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 8.

Protestantism advocates the New Testament conception of and insistence on repentance.¹⁵ Repentance is a prerequisite to the forgiveness of sins. It is a part of the right inner attitude toward God, in view of which God is willing to deal with men. It is that part which includes sorrow for and detestation of sins and such a change of mind toward sin as amounts to a turning away from it. When to repentance is added the abiding confidence in God and his revelation as a Father which faith requires, then men secure forgiveness and the assurance of such without further ado. Such is the abundantly expressed teaching of the New Testament.

Protestants believe in confessing sins primarily and directly to God. They appreciate and accept also the Scripture injunction, "Confess therefore your sins to one another, and pray for one another, that ye may be healed." But Protestants object to the compulsion of Romanist confession, for there is no warrant for it in Scripture and no support in church tradition for a thousand years. Confession to God is necessary for one who chooses to serve God and seeks forgiveness, but confession to a Christian minister is optional. Protestant ministers often receive voluntary confessions and give spiritual advice relative thereto. But, as Von Hase says, "Out of the good deed of taking counsel for the conscience with an experienced man in whom one can confide, according as an individual's circumstances have brought about the need of this, there has come to exist in the Roman Church a compulsion and a snare which oppresses the conscience, chokes the moral sensibilities, and denies Christian liberty."

¹⁵ The Greek words translated "repentance" and "repent" have as their literal and essential meaning "a change of mind." See also larger edition, Appendix, Note 8.

The possibility of securing forgiveness by confessing sins directly to God was clearly implied by Jesus when he taught us to pray, "Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors." He gave no slightest indication that this simple petition would not be answered until the petitioner had confessed to a priest. Indeed, Romanism itself inconsistently admits the possibility of securing forgiveness without confession when it teaches that if, after conscientious self-examination, the confessor has forgotten some of his mortal sins, these are forgiven along with those actually confessed. If God will forgive some without confession, why not all? Protestantism therefore affirms that any follower of Christ can pray directly to God, confessing his sin, and receive forgiveness through his repentance and faith.

Protestants may admit the salutary effect of confession in inspiring fear of wrong-doing, but the incidental benefits are outweighed by the evils connected with it. The arbitrary distinction between mortal and venial sins, the latter of which do not have to be confessed, can have only a demoralizing effect. The power which knowledge gained in the confessional gives the priesthood is a bulwark of ecclesiasticism, which is fraught with danger and has been misused in the past. In the confessional questions too there is positive evil. If these questions do not actually incite to certain kinds of sin, especially in the case of women who learn from them for the first time concerning some immoral practices, they at least create a suggestive atmosphere most unhealthful for good morals. The unpleasant situation is plainly revealed in Romanist books of instructions to priests for hearing confessions. Because of such connected evils Protestantism condemns compulsory auricular confession.

Moreover, God either forgives sin or he requires satisfaction for it. He cannot do both, nor partly one and partly the other on any ethical basis. Paul declared, "There is, therefore, no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 8 : 1), and that what the law, ceremonial or other, could not do, faith in Christ by itself accomplishes, full acquittal from sin and a start on the right road. (Cf. Rom. 8 : 1 with Rom. 3 : 21-30.) Thus God really forgives sins freely without any payment of any kind. Moreover, there is no moral connection between the sins confessed and the penalties prescribed. What has the saying of a certain number of prayers, the fasting from certain foods, or the giving of alms to do with the forgiveness of sin? These acts may have value, but as ethical grounds for forgiveness they are beyond ethical comprehension. Or, of what moral value are penances that may be performed by substitutes? The answer is plain. But the case is still worse. Prayer, the high privilege of personal communion with God the Father, is, when inflicted as a penance, lowered to a punishment for sin; fasting, whose spiritual benefit as a teacher of self-control depends upon voluntary exercise, is made a punishment for sin and an externally efficacious act; and almsgiving, which should spring only from Christian unselfishness, becomes in effect a means of buying with filthy lucre the assurance of God's favor. Surely Jesus, in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 6), clearly enough condemned these very practices when merely external, and laid the emphasis on the praying and fasting and almsgiving which are in secret and come from the innermost motives of the heart. He even condemned as heathenish that much repeating of prayers to which penances have since led. Indeed this entire conception of penalties is utterly foreign to the simplicity and piety of the New Testament.¹⁶

But the crown of the sacramental system is not penance, but the eucharist and the mass. Romanism holds that by the words of consecration spoken by the priest the bread and wine of the Lord's Supper are changed into the actual body and blood of Christ and each is both the body and the blood. "The Catholic doctrine is thus stated in the creed of Pius IV: 'I profess that there is offered to God a true and propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead; and that in the most Holy sacrament of the Eucharist there is truly, really, and substantially the Body and the Blood, together with the Soul and Divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ; and that there takes place a conversion of the whole substance of the bread into the Body and of the whole substance of the wine into the Blood; which conversion the Catholic Church calls transubstantiation. I also confess that under either kind alone Christ is received whole and entire and a true Sacrament.'"¹⁷ Cardinal Gibbons says: "The sacrifice of the Mass is the consecration of the bread and the wine into the body and blood and the oblation of this body and blood to God by the ministry of the priest, for a perpetual memorial of the Christ's sacrifice on the cross. The sacrifice of the Mass is identical with that of the cross, both having the same victim and High Priest—Jesus Christ." Accordingly this ceremony is on the one hand the eucharist, participation in which brings sacramental grace, and on the other it is a repetition of the sacrifice of Jesus as an offering in behalf of those who worship.

¹⁶ Indulgences constitute another element of the Romanist system of penance, but owing to the relative cessation of the promulgation of general indulgences since the time of the Reformation and the consequently comparatively smaller part they now play in Romanism, this matter will be reserved for a later chapter as will also the consideration of the connected thought of purgatory.

The doctrine of transubstantiation is rejected by Protestantism on several grounds. Romanism has no warrant for insisting that Jesus' words, "This is my body," are to be taken literally. Jesus said also, "I am the door" (John 10 : 7), but no one thinks of understanding this as a literal statement. Why should we not consider Jesus' language as figurative in the passage cited for this doctrine, when it is perfectly plain that the bread is not the body and can be conceived of in this language only if it be taken figuratively? Even according to Romanism the "is" is not to be taken to mean identity; for the substance of bread and wine is done away entirely and a new substance is created by a miracle; so that the meaning of "is" according to this view turns out to be something more than literal, and the word really signifies "changed into." There is no warrant for such a meaning of "is." There is consequently no scriptural support for the doctrine, and in addition history proves it to have been a development from small beginnings in the early Christian centuries through various stages of growth until it was finally adopted by the ecclesiastical authority of the Lateran Council (1215). Such poor authority will not with Protestants make up for the lack of Scripture.

¹⁷ Quoted, except last sentence, in Coppens, p. 321.

The repudiation of transubstantiation rests also on the incredibility of the supposed miracle of turning bread and wine, each and both, into the actual body and blood of Jesus with muscles, bones, nerves, and whatsoever appertains to a true body, and also at the same time into Christ's whole soul and divinity. By every standard of judgment which intelligence can apply the elements remain precisely what they were, as a chemical analysis would reveal, and when eaten and drunk they undoubtedly take the same course of digestion as any other food. Moreover, how is the whole physical body of Christ to be conceived as present at once in the eucharistic elements of many widely separated churches, wholly in each place, and at the same time wholly at the right hand of God? One cannot accept transubstantiation unless he sets aside all scientific and reasonable methods of thought.

There is too an objection to this Romanist teaching from the point of view of the religious effect of it. To a piety that springs from the depths of a heart sensitive with reverence for God, it is repulsive to think of eating one's God, and that is what the Romanist teaching involves. It is the actual physical body and blood and also the whole soul and divinity of Christ that one eats in partaking of either the bread or the wine. The Arabian philosopher Averroes could say with justification so far as Romanism and medievalism are concerned, "The Christians adore what they eat," and he might have said, "They eat what they adore." To be sure, the piety of Romanists is not at all shocked by this conception, probably because they do not stop to think of what is involved. But to a thoughtful piety it is repelling. For how can spiritual blessing be conceived to depend upon the manducation of the physical body and blood of Christ?

Agreed unanimously as to the rejection of transubstantiation, Protestants have had several different interpretations of the significance of the Lord's Supper. The Lutheran view, least far removed from the Roman Catholic, held that the body and blood were present in the elements since God is Christ, and therefore Christ, like God, is everywhere. This view can be true only if the physical body of Christ is ubiquitous; this conception is almost as difficult as transubstantiation. Calvin held that since the presence of a thing was indicated by the presence of its power, Christ's presence in the elements was certain, since his power influenced partakers of the supper. The Anglican, or Episcopalian, view holds that there is a real presence in the elements, much in the same sense as the burning bush was a manifestation to Moses of the real presence of God. None of these views claims to be specifically taught in the Scriptures, but only to be interpretation of Scripture statements. Each of them insists that Christ is present in the bread and wine.

An additional view, however, which best accords with the whole teaching of the New Testament, which is most harmonious with the fundamental Protestant position, and which best meets the demand of a reasonable conception of the spiritual life, is that the bread and wine represent as symbols the body and blood of Christ. According to this view Christ's presence is of the kind he promised when he said: "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them" (Matt. 18 : 20). He is in the hearts of the worshipers spiritually, and the only function which the elements perform is their suggestiveness as symbols, calling to mind the Lord's passion, and as necessary parts of an impressive ceremony, the psychological accompaniments of which are spiritually helpful because God through Christ is in the heart to bless it.

On the basis of this last view the religious significance of the Lord's Supper may be made plain. Any one may secure through participation in this ceremony the greatest spiritual blessing, provided only he has faith and takes the proper attitude in the observance. The piety and experience of the Christian centuries, taken in addition to the teachings of the New Testament, are sufficient evidence of this. But there are different ways of explaining how the blessing comes. The Romanist says that it comes in virtue of the miracle of changing the bread and wine into the actual body and blood and soul and divinity of Christ. Protestantism says, and most consistently in the view last stated above, that the blessing comes from the presence of God in the worshiper's heart, that is, through the miracle of inner spiritual communion with God. The bread and wine as symbols suggest the body and blood of Christ, and thus through this suggestion lead to that attitude of receptive faith and pious meditation which are the means through which God cooperates with the human spirit. Participation in the common meal adds the sense of Christian fellowship.

Romanism prolongs the Lord's Supper by adding to the eucharist, or sacrament of sharing the bread and wine, the mass. Following the Old Testament conception of the priest, and conceiving that the priestly office must include the sacrificial function, Romanism holds that its priesthood fulfils this function by performing sacrifice in the mass.¹⁸ This sacrifice of Christ is an offering to God on behalf of all present. The mass not only memorializes or calls to mind the sacrifice of Christ, but repeats it. It logically follows that the priest must be conceived as again putting our Lord to death as he was once crucified on behalf of the world. Moreover, in the popular mind at least, and in the idea of masses for the dead, the Romanist notion of sacrifice in the mass runs into that of pagan propitiation; for participation in the ceremony through inner attitude on the part of those sharing the benefits of the sacrifice is no longer thought of as necessary, and is impossible in the case of the dead. Protestantism repudiates all such ideas as external, unreasonable, and even as unchristian and pagan.

Protestantism urges against the conception of the mass the utter absence of any reference to it in the New Testament. Certainly at the institution of the ¹⁸ Since comparatively few persons partake of the bread, the only element allowed the laity, the regular church service of the Romanist churches has come to be almost entirely this prolonged mass or sacrifice. Mere presence at the elevation of the host secures divine grace.

Lord's Supper there was no idea of repeating the sacrifice of Christ. The teaching of the New Testament implies precisely the contrary of the Romanist notion, for it states that Christ made a sacrifice once for all and that his death did away with the need of sacrifices. (For example, Heb. 9 : 12, 25, 26, 28; 10 : 10, 12, 14, 18.) This is a precise denial that Christ's sacrifice has to be repeated. As if the value of Jesus' sacrifice could be increased by a mere priest of any religious body! The only sacrifices expected of Christians are those of the spiritual inner life and what may be thereby practically involved. (Ps. 51 : 17.) The necessary sacrificial spirit is indeed helped by participation in the Lord's Supper, for the memory of the sacrifice of Christ is sanctified to the strengthening of the worshiper's sacrificial spirit by the Spirit of God in his heart.

The final feature of the Romanist eucharist needing notice is the withholding of the cup from the laity. No Scripture warrant for this is claimed, and it is not held that this has been the custom of the church in all times. It is frankly admitted that both the bread and wine were given to the laity in the early church. The first thousand years of the church knew little of any other custom. At least four popes favored or commanded the administering in both kinds, and the decrees of councils have vacillated from one position to the other.¹⁹ This wavering is excused by the Romanists on the plea that the church need not give reasons for its decrees—a strange contention of believers in an infallible and unchangeable teaching office. Some very trivial arguments in support of the custom are sometimes put forth, such as that the laity are likely to spill the sacred wine. But the essential reason for maintaining the administering in one kind to the laity is the glorification of the priesthood as alone fully entitled to a place at the Lord's Supper. Protestants without exception maintain the custom of the New Testament church.

¹⁹ For some historical evidence, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 9.

The special privilege of the cup is in keeping with the priestly prerogatives which arise out of the sacrament of order or ordination. Through the divine grace imparted by this sacrament, according to Romanism, is bestowed the power of order, that is, of preaching the word, of administering the sacraments, and of jurisdiction, by which is meant authority in the church and particularly in the confessional. This power is exclusively the prerogative of the ordained.

Protestants have ceremonies of ordination, but, except in the case of those who, like the Episcopalians, believe in apostolic succession, they do not conceive that these ceremonies convey any special grace to the minister or make him a different kind or grade of being. These ceremonies are but the formal way of recognizing the call and the fitness of individuals to the special work of the ministry, whose functions are reserved for the ordained, not on the ground that a sacerdotal order is necessary for mediation between God and men, but merely for the sake of orderliness in the arrangements of the church and for the sake of efficiency in its work. Protestants do not conceive that any special powers inhere in the ministry. The only ground for accepting the Romanist doctrine as to "order" is the tradition of the hierarchy.

Romanism regards marriage also as a sacrament, though it was certainly not instituted by Christ as the Romanist definition of sacrament would require. Scriptural warrant is found in Paul's statement, "Husbands, love your wives, as Christ also loved the church, and delivered himself up for it. . . This is a great sacrament, but I speak in Christ and in the church" (Eph. 5 : 25, 32, Douai English Version). But this translation is false, for the word expressed in Latin as "sacrament" means in Greek "mystery." Besides, as appears from the verses between the two quoted, the mystery is not that of marriage but of the relation of Christ and the church. Paul definitely states, "This mystery is great, but I speak in regard of Christ and of the church" (English Revised Version). The Latin Vulgate, except for the one word which means sacrament, is capable of being rendered in precisely this language. Cajetan, the brilliant opponent of Luther, admitted that this passage could not be used for teaching that marriage is a sacrament.

Romanist theologians are far from clearness or agreement either as to the "form" or "matter" of this supposed sacrament.²⁰ The "form" is either the benediction of the priest or the acceptance of each other by the contracting parties. The significance of this for practical purposes is shown in the fact that if the "form" is the benediction of the priest, there are no real Christian marriages except those performed by Romanist priests. The declarations of different popes may be appealed to for both views of the "form." Yet most recently the encyclical letters (the most weighty authority in the church) of Pius X, widely published in this country a few years ago, decided for the priestly benediction, and consequently the infallible pope has settled it that no one is living in real Christian marriage relations except those married by Romanist priests. Certainly some priests tell the plain people that they are living illicitly if married by another than a Romanist priest, and attempts have been made to break up families on this basis. Such declarations, whether cathedraic and infallible or not, have no legal standing or effect in such a country as ours, but they serve to show the actual position and spirit of the Romanist hierarchy. Their very statement has, to the knowledge of the present writer, driven people out of the Roman Church, and the contention itself obviously does not require refutation.²¹

²⁰ In Romanism "form" is the technical term for the effective formula of a sacrament, and "matter" is the term for the necessary material used, such as water in baptism, bread and wine in the eucharist.

Protestantism finds no reason to regard marriage as a sacrament, especially as Protestants repudiate sacramentalism. It does conceive marriage as divinely appointed and approved as a social institution.²²

The final sacrament of the Roman Church is also the final one for life, extreme unction. Scriptural warrant is claimed in the passages which refer to the common practice in ancient times of dealing with sickness by anointing with oil under religious influences. (James 5 : 14f.; Mark 6 : 13; 16 : 18.) But this custom looked to the recovery of the sick and not to preparation for dying, and the scriptural injunction is to the lay brethren, not to a special priesthood. There is no great antiquity for the practice of extreme unction as a sacrament. The name itself did not come into use until the eighth century, and then only to indicate a remedy for the sick. Romanism holds that this sacrament conveys the divine grace necessary to remove the guilt of transgressions which may remain to be expiated at the time of death. Protestantism rejects the sacrament and the practice of anything like it as a religious ceremony.

²¹ Marriages between Protestants and Romanists are an almost inevitable source of family difficulty. Even where it has been agreed beforehand that the Protestant party shall have some freedom personally and some control over the religious training of the children, the agreement is often not lived up to. Even when the Catholic party is willing to abide by his or her agreement, his or her Romanist relatives are free to exercise the Romanist duty to bring all into the one true church. Certainly when people of such different religious affiliations and principles as Protestants and Romanists marry, they take into their hand their happiness and the effectiveness of home-making. If Romanists could agree to disagree it might be different, but the position of their church forbids this. Thus religion, which should strengthen and sweeten the home, becomes a spring of discord.

²² For a comparison of Romanist and Protestant positions as to divorce, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 10.

Finally, it is to be reiterated that Protestant views as to the ceremonies of the church are controlled by the fundamental emphasis upon the value of faith. The worth of the rites of the church depends upon the faith of the participant, and upon the ceremonies themselves only in so far as they are the appropriate expression of an inner experience and suggestive of those considerations which help faith. God is in the hearts of the worshipers, and blesses them through faith.

Quiz

1. How do the Old and New Testaments condemn ceremonialism?
2. What is the Protestant use of this scriptural condemnation?
3. What two main ideas of Romanist sacramentalism does Protestantism reject?
4. What is the Protestant affirmation here?
5. What is the number of the sacraments?
6. What are the Romanist and Protestant views as to baptism?
7. How do some Protestants differ as to the form and subjects of baptism?
8. What are the grounds of objection to infant baptism?
9. For the insistence on immersion?
10. What is confirmation?
11. What is the sacrament of penance? 12. What is the Protestant view of repentance? 13. What is the positive Protestant view of confession, and what are the objections to the Romanist confessional? 14. What is the Romanist conception of the eucharist? 15. What are the grounds of Protestant rejection of transubstantiation? 16. What are the several Protestant conceptions of the Lord's Supper? 17. Which agrees best with the fundamental Protestant position? 18. What is the Romanist mass? 19. What are the Protestant grounds of rejection? 20. Why do Romanists withhold from the laity the communal cup? 21. What are the Protestant and Romanist views of ordination? 22. What is the position of Protestantism as to marriage in contrast to Romanism? 23. What is extreme unction, and why does Protestantism reject it?

Suggestions for Further Study

1. How does the fundamental Protestant principle relate to the ceremonies of your church? 2. How must you secure religious benefit from Christian ceremonies? 3. The relation of the Protestant conception of the ceremonies to the necessity of church-membership and church attendance. 4. The practical effect of the Romanist theory of marriage upon mixed marriages of Protestants and Romanists. 5. The effect of Romanist exclusiveness on the happiness of married life.

CHAPTER V

THE CHURCH AND THE MINISTRY

MORE fundamental even than the conceptions discussed in the preceding chapters is the contrast between Protestant and Romanist teaching concerning the function of the church and the authority of the same in all religious matters. Ultimately the decisions of Romanists concerning the ideas already discussed rest upon their position in regard to the church and its authority. For Protestants likewise, the question of the source of authority for religious thought and practice is of primary importance. In this connection there are four main subjects for consideration: (1) The nature and function of the church; (2) the ministry of the church; (3) the authority of the pope in contrast to private judgment; and (4) the question of whether Romanism is the sole channel of grace or whether religious life and certainty concerning it can be had on the Protestant basis. The first two of these are the subject of this chapter.

Since for Protestantism faith is the basis and essence of religious life, the church is conceived of as the aggregate of those who have faith in God through Christ. It thus includes all Christians of whatever shades of opinion, provided only that they have a living personal faith. This is the ideal church, the true catholic or universal church. The visible church is the church organized on a voluntary basis in many different ways in the various communions, and as emphasizing the various phases of Christian truth. The visible church is thus not a single organization, but an aggregate of organizations composed of those who have faith in God through Christ. While each group of Protestants is loyal to its own opinions and practices, Protestantism holds that the Christian church includes Romanist, Eastern Catholic, and Protestant branches. Churches exist as organizations for the strengthening of Christian life by means of public worship and instruction, Christian fellowship, and Christian service. The churches are also working forces for the evangelization and the Christianization of the world. In this work the laity as well as the ministers are assigned a very large and legitimate part. The local church in Protestantism becomes also the center of social life of the people, a responsibility for the social life is felt, and a definite effort is made to meet the need. Still further, the Protestant churches are coming to-day to emphasize that the teachings of Jesus must be taken by Christian people, not merely into that individual life which centers about the thought of individual communion with God and individual salvation, but also into those applications which will mean the construction of human society on the basis of Christian principles. All of this organized life is thought of as the opportunity and expression of faith.

The Romanist view of the church differs from this conception in conceiving the ideal, invisible church as future and as arising from the visible church, and in regarding inclusion in the ideal church as dependent upon right relations with the visible church. According to Protestantism, the church could not exist except for the Christian disposition in the hearts of those who constitute it. As mutual love leads to marriage, so faith in God and love for him lead to the institution of the church. Romanism, on the other hand, conceives that out of the church arises the disposition of a Christian, as if the existence of the institution of marriage and the performance of the ceremony created the mutual love. Consequently, according to this view, submission to the one true church is essential before there can be any Christian life. This one true church is the visible organization in the world which possesses certain marks: apostolicity, catholicity, holiness, and unity.

The only church which has these marks is the Roman Church. Its apostolicity consists in the founding of the church of Rome by the apostles; that is, in the fact, as Romanists claim, that Peter, the head of the apostles, was the first bishop of Rome, to whom Christ handed over authority and power; and in the transmission of this authority and power by an unbroken succession to the present through the bishops of Rome. Catholicity consists in universal diffusion throughout the world and "identity as to faith and communion in whatever place." The holiness of the church is not the actual achievement of holiness on the part of all its members, but is, according to the Roman Catechism, the church's ceremonial and historically continuous consecration to God, its historical union with Christ, the head—that is, through the unbroken apostolic succession, not through ethical identification of the church-members' purposes with Christ's—and its sole possession of the sacrificial cultus and of the sacraments which are the means of effecting true holiness. The Roman Church has unity through its one organization, its oneness of doctrinal belief, and its unchangeability throughout the ages. Therefore, the Roman Church is the only real Christian church, and alone possesses the power of dispensing the divine grace necessary for salvation. Its one chief demand is submissive obedience with all which that obedience involves. Through this obedience Romanism makes relationship to Christ depend upon relationship to the church, whereas Protestantism makes relationship to Christ determine relationship to the church.

Rome's claims to be the only true church rest essentially upon the claim of apostolicity, which is expressed in the declaration of the Vatican Council that "the holy and blessed Peter . . . lives, presides, and judges to this day and always, in his successors, the bishops of the Holy See of Rome, which was founded by him and consecrated by his blood." There are three elements in this claim: (1) Peter founded the church at Rome; (2) he was its first bishop; (3) he was martyred at Rome.

There is no positive evidence that Peter was ever at Rome except the unsupported tradition that he was martyred there and the patristic tradition of his presence in Rome, which is first clearly expressed by Irenæus about A. D. 176, or more than one hundred years after the supposed event. Quotations by Romanists of Church Fathers, who are supposed to give an earlier expression of the tradition, will not bear examination.

On the other hand, there is positive evidence that proves the unreliability of the first and second allegations of fact and leaves the third without any force for the Romanist contention. The supposition that Peter was the first bishop of Rome is directly contradicted by the fact plainly manifested in the New Testament that the apostles did not hold local pastorates or bishoprics. Likewise, the New Testament account of Peter's movements renders it impossible to credit the tradition as to Peter's Roman bishopric, since that tradition places him in Rome during the twenty-five years in which the New Testament speaks of his presence elsewhere. Paul's letter to the Romans implies

(Rom. 15 : 20) that he would not have planned to visit or sought to influence the church at Rome had Peter or any other apostle been its founder. Nor, had Peter been bishop when this letter was written, as the twenty-five years of the tradition requires, would Paul have failed to mention him, especially as he sends salutations to several individuals at Rome. Besides, the claim of Rome is contrary to the very Church Fathers whose statements are supposed to favor the Roman contention. Irenæus, the first to give a list of the Roman bishops, specifically says that the bishopric was committed, after the founding of the church, to Linus and, in the list of bishops following this statement, Linus is first, since Eleutherius appears as and is declared to be twelfth. Eusebius, writing about A. D. 324, said distinctly, "Linus was the first to obtain the episcopate of the church at Rome." Thus the evidence of the New Testament and of the Fathers, Irenæus and Eusebius, disposes of the supposition that Peter was the founder and first bishop of the church at Rome.

The church at Rome probably came into being naturally and spontaneously through the gathering in Rome of Christians from various parts of the empire. It is extremely doubtful that Peter was ever in Rome, as was just said. If Peter did die a martyr in Rome as alleged, that fact had no relation to the Romanist claim to apostolicity, since the claim really depends on the impossible contention that Peter was the founder and first bishop of Rome.

Even if all the allegations of fact made by Rome's claims were granted, the Roman contention would not be established, for there is not the slightest trace of evidence that Peter as apostle or as first bishop ever handed over to his supposed successor any prerogatives or powers. Lack of evidence at this point is precisely fatal to the Romanist position.

In contrast to Romanism, whatever may be said of the incompleteness in the position of any single branch of Protestantism, Protestants, as a whole, have at least urged the higher ideals as to the characteristics of the true church. For Protestantism regards apostolicity as the inheritance of the whole of the Christian heritage and as agreement with the spirit, teachings, and practices of the New Testament, rather than as the possession of special ecclesiastical prerogatives handed down by a succession from Peter, which cannot be given even the semblance of probability in view of the evidence. Protestants have not, as is sometimes stated, started new religions, but continue New Testament Christianity in new appreciations and developments as much as other branches continue it in medieval and outworn forms. The succession of the inheritance of Christianity and agreement with the New Testament, which do not depend upon the confirming hand of an ecclesiastical officer, constitute the only apostolic succession worth considering.

Further, Protestantism defines catholicity or universality in the terms of breadth and charity to recognize as such all Christians who have faith in God through Christ and are loyal to Christ and the teachings of the Bible, and not as mere geographical and external diffusion of one ecclesiastical and creedal type of Christianity. As a matter of fact, Rome has not been the mother of all churches. Jesus' command that preaching should begin at Jerusalem (Luke 24 : 47) and the whole New Testament point to Jerusalem as the first center, and it is plain that Rome was far from being in any such position in the early Christian church. Even when Rome had become the center of Western Christianity, her relationship to the Eastern and Celtic Churches will not bear out her claim. In regard to Rome's motherhood of all modern Christian advance, such a statement as that of Cardinal Gibbons¹ shows a strange and inexcusable ignorance of the history of Protestant missions. But such a claim of priority in introducing the gospel upon this or that continent is beside the mark, for catholicity depends on the possession of New Testament saving faith. Wherever men with faith join together to maintain and propagate the Christianity of the New Testament and to practise a life in accord with the same, they are a part of the true catholic church, whatever may be their theological opinions or their ecclesiastical practices. The whole church is truly catholic only when it includes all who have real faith in Jesus Christ.

¹ "Faith of Our Fathers," p. 139.

Similarly, Protestantism defines the holiness of the church, when considered a possession, as real moral achievement, and when held to be a power of impartation, as ability to lead by persuasion and other religious influence to moral achievement, and not as consisting in the sole possession of the sacrificial and other cultus through which alone ceremonial holiness can be secured. However much the antiquity of the church may inspire reverence, ultimately respect for the church must rest upon the recognition by men that it has been the agency in the hands of God in wielding those influences which have led to and fostered a faith in God through Christ and a life in accord with such faith. Neither the possession of, nor the power to impart, holiness is monopolized by any one branch of the church, as the moral and spiritual achievements of the various groups indicate.

As to unity, Protestantism holds that real Christian unity consists in the common possession of the spirit and faith of Jesus and the apostles, and in holding to an ethical purpose and life, such as that for which the Master prayed when he asked of God that his followers might be one as he and his Father were one. Such unity allows cooperation in Christian work, and is possible in spite of divergence of creedal statements, in spite of a number of distinct church organizations, and in spite of the absence of even a claim to an unchangeable or other authoritative tradition. Such unity Protestantism, in a large measure, already possesses. Rome, with all her intolerance, has not been able to achieve her own ideal of unity in her own communion, and it is her attitude which renders cooperation between her and other Christians impossible.²

The mere statement of these ideals of Protestantism, since they so commend themselves to the modern mind, convincingly disposes of the claim of Rome to be the only true catholic church, and this disposal is confirmed by Rome's failure either to conceive or achieve these ideals. An analogous conclusion may be reached also with reference to the idea of the minister and his function.

In the New Testament time ministers were simply those who were set aside for specific services in the church. One will look in vain for anything that smacks of a sacerdotal order. Protestants take as ground for their positive teaching of the priesthood of all believers such passages as Revelation 1 : 6 and 1 Peter 2 : 5 (and others of the same purport and of corroborative significance) which refer to the priestly function of all Christians. According to this doctrine, any one who has faith may exercise the functions of priesthood, since faith of itself gives access to God without the mediation of a special order of officials. Communion with God, therefore, does not wait upon sacerdotal prerogatives, but is possible to the humblest Christian. Protestants conceive, however, that for the sake of orderliness and efficiency in the church's work it is necessary to have specially educated men to whom is assigned the work of ministers. Men who can give evidence of an inward call to such work and who have received sufficient training for it are ordained to be the spiritual leaders and teachers of the church. Their ordination is only the ecclesiastical recognition of their call and fitness. Protestantism does not make its ministers by their ordination into a special order of beings different from other Christians, and possessing divine prerogatives and power to dispense or withhold God's grace as they may see fit. Protestantism thinks of its ministers only as divinely called and specially trained persons, chosen to perform the functions which any real Christian has the religious right to perform.

² For evidence of disunion in Romanism, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 11.

The Romanist conception of the clergy, as persons who have been set aside as a special class with divine powers by the ecclesiastical institution which constitutes the only channel of God's grace, is clearly stated by the theologian Moehler: "For the exercise of public functions in the Church, for the discharge of the office of teaching, and for the administration of the sacraments a divine internal calling and a higher qualification are above all things required. . . . As the preservation of the doctrine and institutions of Christ has been entrusted to the Church . . . he [the priest] receives through her external consecration the inward consecration of God; or, in other words, he receives through the laying on of hands of the bishop the Holy Ghost" (pp. 304-306). Accordingly, the priest possesses an externally imparted supernatural power, which, in the popular mind at least, is easily merged into superstitious regard for a supposed magical control of spiritual matters. Thomas Aquinas said: "A priest is a sort of middleman and mediator between God and the people, as we read of Moses, and therefore it belongs to him to deliver the divine decrees to the people; and again, that which comes from the people in the way of prayers and sacrifices and offerings ought to be paid to God through the priests."³ Except by baptism, divine grace cannot be secured without the priest's activity, and not even in the case of baptism if a priest is accessible. The priest too, by his divine power, can turn bread and wine into the actual flesh and blood and bones and soul and divinity of Jesus. In the mass also the priest has the power of repeating Christ's sacrificial death. He holds the power of forgiving sins, the power of absolution, and of administering the sacraments upon which forgiveness depends.⁴ In the absence of any trace of such a priesthood in the New Testament, it is impossible to escape the force and validity of the Protestant conception plainly supported by the New Testament, which holds the ministry to be an office to which is delegated for the sake of efficiency and good order the functions and capacities which really belong to any one who has faith.

³ Quoted by Coppens, p. 232.

⁴ For a Jesuit estimate of the priest and for the use of the word "priest" in the Douai Version, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 12.

Protestantism differs from Romanism, not only in regard to this general conception of the minister, but also with reference to the necessity and wisdom of a celibate ministry. Rome requires that her priests shall take the vow of celibacy in order that the priest, having only an ecclesiastical conscience, may be freer for the work of the church than a man of family can be, and also, and this is the characteristic ground, because the celibate state is regarded by Romanism, according to pagan ascetic ideas, as a higher moral state than matrimony. Upon these two arguments of expediency and asceticism Rome must depend, for one will look in vain in the New Testament for any trace of a celibate sacerdotal order. History reveals that the adoption of celibacy, even theoretically, came only after a long struggle, and has never been universal, since in particular the Eastern Catholic Church has never required it.

The Romanist argument of expediency is based on a false assumption, for the Protestant minister with his family is no less devoted to his work than the Roman priest. The contacts of life with wife and children, the joys of these associations, and even the cares of family responsibilities enrich the character of the minister and give him a knowledge of life which enables him to give wise advice and sympathy to married people. Then too, a married minister escapes the temptations to which celibacy subjects men. The effectiveness of Christian ministers must meet the test of their moral integrity in relation to the opposite sex. The history of celibacy is a sad and revolting story and a record of failure.⁵ The Protestant ministry is relieved of the compulsion of celibacy's hindrance to effectiveness, while at the same time nothing prevents any man practising it if he is of that mind. Consequently the ministry loses nothing through the privilege of marriage, but rather gains in efficiency.

The assumption as to the essential impurity of the sex relation is also false. This relation is as much God-given and as legitimately human as any other relation of life. Even if chastity in the sense of celibacy were a holier state than marriage, the mere vow of celibacy and the formal keeping of the same would not really achieve this state. Jesus said, "I say unto you, that every one that looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart" (Matt. 5 : 28). Romanist writers themselves have given us ample descriptions of the internal conflicts of priests who nevertheless maintain their vows outwardly. But chastity is not to be confounded with celibacy. There is no higher chastity than that of a pure, well-regulated marriage. The New Testament shows us that the early ministry was married, yet chaste.⁶ Accordingly, Protestantism repudiates the ascetic assumption as to celibacy and maintains the socially beneficial institution of the minister's family with its character-developing influence on the minister, and with its real contribution to the work of the church.

⁵ Even Pope Pius II (1458-1464), referring to the failure of celibacy, said, "Reasons have been found for denying marriage to the clergy, but perhaps there are still greater to be found for restoring it."

Romanism and Protestantism have also a different view as to the grades of the ministry. Speaking generally, the Protestants⁷ of this country have only the two ranks of ministry, deacons and pastors (also called bishops or elders), which are known to the New Testament. In congregationally governed bodies men entering the ministry seldom go first through the diaconate, as is the case in other bodies. Some denominations use the title "bishop" without distinguishing a third rank in the ministry. For example, the Methodist Episcopal Church assigns to certain pastors the duties of general supervision, and then calls them, because of their election to perform these duties, "bishops." Moreover, in the last analysis the authority and privileges of the Protestant ministry arise from, and are delegated by, the people of the church, composed of those who have faith in Christ and who are members by personal choice. This accords with the situation in the New Testament.

⁶ For New Testament evidence, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 13.

⁷ The Lutheran churches of the Scandinavian countries, the Anglican Church, and its representative in America—the Protestant Episcopal Church—have an additional rank of bishop.

Romanism has three orders of the clergy. They are deacons who have not yet attained to full priestly powers and prerogatives, priests, and lastly bishops, who alone can confirm and can confer priestly ordination, and who control, as commanders, the priests of their respective dioceses. The ultimate source of appointment and authority of the priesthood of the three ranks is the pope, so that the priestly authority, powers, and privileges come down from him rather than arise from the people. For a long while the bishops of the early church, after the bishopric as a distinct office had been differentiated from the eldership and raised above it, were elected by the people of their respective dioceses. The bishopric of Protestant bodies which retain it preserves a greater measure of the freedom and democracy of this early situation than does Romanism.

Therefore, in regard to the ministry as in regard to the nature and function of the church, it is Protestantism, not Romanism, which is in harmony with the New Testament, and whose views are natural and reasonable.

Quiz

1. What is the Protestant view of the nature and function of the church? 2. What is the Romanist view? 3. What are the Romanist "marks"? 4. The Romanist claim to apostolicity and the probable actual origin of the church at Rome. 5. What is the Protestant interpretation of the so-called "marks"? 6. Is the Roman Church the only true church? 7. What is the Protestant view of the ministry? 8. What is the Romanist view? 9. Why is a married ministry the better? 10. What false assumptions are the basis of the Romanist requirement of an unmarried ministry? 11. What are the different ranks in the Protestant and in the Romanist ministries?

Suggestions for Further Study

1. The various evidences of the lack of unity in the Roman Church in the past and present. 2. The sense in which Protestants may trace their continuity to the New Testament time. 3. Is your church apostolic? 4. The method by which Rome has maintained a semblance of unity. 5. The greater breadth of the Protestant view of the church.

CHAPTER VI

RELIGIOUS AUTHORITY

FOR Protestants, the final authority in religion is the Scriptures, interpreted with the help of God's Spirit present in the heart through faith and by the best intelligence and widest knowledge obtainable. Such authority is plainly not merely external. Protestants acknowledge the authority of the Scripture because they are convinced of its divine value as the source of religious ideas and inspirations, and because they conceive that it can have value only as men use it from conviction and choice. This conception will be set forth below in greater detail after the Romanist position has been stated and the Protestant estimate of the same has been presented.

The first step in this presentation is the Romanist definition of the church's infallibly authoritative teaching office. According to the Jesuit Coppens, "As a body of believers she [the church] cannot believe what is false; as a teaching body—and as such we consider her here—she cannot teach what is false" (p. 91). Thus Romanism takes the consciousness which the whole body of Christians have always had of their possession of God's truth in the gospel and turns it into an indefinable supernatural power to avoid error in belief and in teaching. The only basis for accepting such a claim of power is Rome's own assertion that she possesses it.

Rome claims to exercise this supernatural power in the use of Scripture. She insists that she rests her position on Scripture. But by virtue of her power in the teaching office she claims that the Scriptures must first be interpreted by her before they are of any value. For this interpretation she uses what she regards as valid tradition—the valid decrees of the general councils as she is willing to accord them validity, and, most important of all, the infallible authority of the pope's ex-cathedra declarations. Coppens says in regard to reading dogmatic views into the Scriptures: "A sensible translation is an interpretation or commentary; and every translator reads his own dogmatic views into the passages interpreted. This is as it should be when the dogmatic views are supported by an infallible authority. But heretics thus make the Bible teach heresy." This implies the introduction of dogmatic views into all interpretation of the Scripture and not alone into translation. Perrone (quoted by Von Hase) even more naively declares: "Catholics are not very solicitous as to the criticism and interpretation of the Holy Scripture. For they themselves, to put the matter in a word, have the fabric already prepared and complete, and stand firm and secure in its possession." Romanists seem entirely oblvious that such statements show their argument to be proceeding in a circle, for Rome claims to establish her teaching by Scripture, but then establishes the teaching of Scripture by her dogmatic conceptions. According to this assertion of the power of the teaching office, there is absolutely no appeal to Scripture which can possibly be used to refute Romanism because, however clearly by every standard of science and intelligence the writers of the Bible meant something different from Romanist dogmas, they did not mean any such thing, for the church teaches the contrary.

Rome's subordination of the Scripture to the teaching office has led to her hostility to the lay use of the Bible. Excepting the statements of the earliest popes, the official attitude of Rome has been persistently against such use.¹ In a country such as ours Rome grants more readily than elsewhere permission to read a version in the common tongue. Dens, a Romanist writer, says that the sale of the Douai Bible in Romanist bookstores is a relaxation of the rule of the church permitted in Protestant countries.² This relaxation is possibly due to the fear that without it intelligent laymen will make use of the easily accessible versions in English which are scholarly rather than Romanist; for, if the Bible is to be read, it had better be read in a version which conserves the interests of Romanism as far as possible. As late as January 26, 1914, a public ecclesiastical burning of the Scriptures took place in the Philippine Islands.³ Without running fatal dangers to her whole position, Rome cannot permit the general use of the Scriptures except under the control and interpretation of her teaching office.

¹ For evidence as to this hostility, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 14.

² Quoted by McKim, p. 176.

The teaching office is regarded as having its embodiment in tradition. Historically this was the first conception of the agency of the teaching power of the church. According to Moehler (p. 279) tradition "is the living word perpetuated in the heart of believers." In other words, it is the consensus of Christian opinion. During the first two or three centuries at least, this opinion was formulated necessarily by individual Fathers. Thus more objectively, tradition is the definite deposit of propositions which are infallible and unchangeable. These are to be found in the accounts of martyrs, in liturgies, in the writings of the Church Fathers and of the schoolmen, and in inscriptions. The standard of infallibility is that any given proposition should have been accepted everywhere, always, and by all. But this standard is an impossible one, for tradition is full of most incredible material. Consequently, in spite of the requirement of this standard by the creed of Pius IV and by the Council of Trent, Romanism does not now ascribe infallibility to all tradition, but only to that which the church selects as infallible. Perrone naively says, "The belief that prevails at present is the surest criterion by which to recognize what has been the belief of the church in each century." Thus the teaching office subordinates its own embodiment to itself, and again argues in a circle by claiming tradition as an authoritative basis, but refusing any tradition that does not suit its purposes.

³ See R. J. Miller, "Fundamentals of Protestantism."

The attitude of Protestantism toward tradition is intelligible and intelligent. It insists that what constitutes tradition must be determined by scientific study as any historical facts are determined, not by arbitrary selection of alleged historical situations to serve a special purpose. When secured, tradition is to be estimated according to the New Testament. Jesus upbraided the Pharisees for making void the word of God by their traditions. (Mark 7 : 5-13.) Paul gave warning in more than one letter against following the traditions of men in contrast to his own spoken and written words of gospel instruction. (Col. 2 : 8; 2 Tim. 4 : 4; 2 Thess. 2 : 15; 3 : 6.) On the foundation of this scriptural attitude toward tradition, Protestantism refuses to allow tradition to interpret the Scripture contrary to its plain meaning, to set aside or supplant any scriptural teaching, or in any way to alter the Scripture. Protestantism is willing to see in tradition, where scientific study warrants it, an unfolding and a corroboration of Scripture, but not an original source of Christianity equal or superior to the Scripture. It holds that the proper source of Christian truth and authority is to be found in the Bible, and especially in Jesus' life and words, together with their interpretation at the hands of the apostles who have contributed to the New Testament. The Protestant attitude toward tradition is consequently reasonable and convincing.

The church early came to feel that tradition or the consensus of Christian opinion was too elusive. This feeling resulted in the calling of councils, composed of all the bishops of the church, wherever located, to determine the important mooted points. From the fourth to the seventh century these general or ecumenical councils were the supreme ecclesiastical authority. Rome to-day recognizes the authority of those councils which she regards as truly ecumenical.⁴ The creed of Pius IV requires this declaration, "I likewise undoubtedly receive and profess all other things delivered, defined, and declared by the Sacred Canons and General Councils and particularly by the Holy Council of Trent."

Yet Rome now proceeds very cautiously in claiming infallible authority for councils. For one reason, councils have sometimes been called and held under very trying pressure from the secular power, and their representative character both as to extent and quality of representation may often be justly questioned. Besides, even those which fully meet the external requirements of the definition of ecumenical councils have disagreed among themselves from time to time.⁵ Consequently, in any given case the one council or the other was clearly fallible. The fallibility of councils was manifest fairly early in the medieval times, especially to some popes who began to argue for the supremacy of the popes over councils. In spite of this papal propaganda, the general council was still supreme at the time of the Reformation, for, just a hundred years before, the Council of Constance (1414-1418) settled the Great Schism by unseating three popes and electing another on the declared ground that the general council was superior to the pope. The papal succession since has depended upon this action. Yet from that time the struggle for the exaltation of the pope above the council went on until the Vatican Council (1870) decreed that the pope was not only supreme, but infallible. Thus Rome has subjected the general council, which was the second historically developed agent of the teaching office of the church, to the teaching office as embodied in the infallible pope.

⁴ For a brief summary of acts of councils recognized by Rome as ecumenical, see R. J. Miller, "The Fundamentals of Protestantism," pp. 174f. Also see the International Encyclopedia, article "Councils."

Protestantism points to the absence from the New Testament of anything like a general council or its authority, and refuses, therefore, to grant that decrees of councils are determinative. Any differences between such decrees and scientifically ascertained teachings of the Scriptures must be settled by an appeal to the Scripture alone, for there is no sound reason for allowing authority to mutually disagreeing and therefore fallible councils. However, Protestants hold that councils often interpreted Christian truth with essential correctness, but such respect as they are willing to pay to decrees of councils is due not to the authority of the council, but to that of the Scriptures which the council in a given instance correctly interpreted.

⁵ Of many instances of such disagreement the following example is sufficient. The fifth Council of Constantinople (A. D. 553) set aside the decision of the Council of Chalcedon as to the heresy of two Eastern bishops. See also larger edition, Appendix, Note 9.

Final authority for Romanism now rests with the pope both in matters of teaching and administration, though infallibility is claimed only for the teaching function. Coppens, in referring to the decree of the Vatican Council, describes the pope's infallibility thus: "It is to be observed that the decree explains ex-cathedra utterances to be teachings or definitions, not acts of government, still less of personal conduct; and only those teachings which regard faith and morals, and which the pope addresses to the whole church in the exercise of his supreme apostolic authority. If there is room to doubt whether any particular utterance fulfils these conditions, the doubt is dissolved by considering the circumstances of the pronouncement. If doubt still remains, the utterance is not known for certain to be infallible." This definition certainly reveals infallibility to be sufficiently elusive to serve any purpose of the hierarchy.⁶

Though Rome claims there has been no development, the decree of the Vatican Council is the culmination of Rome's long search for an external infallible authority. The claim of an unchangeable and infallible authority of the pope is the logical and absolutely necessary issue of the Romanist system. Without this claim Rome could not find any ground for her dogmas; for her rejection, for the sake of her own dogmatic interests, of scientifically reasonable interpretations of the Scriptures, of tradition, and of decrees of councils; for her excommunication of those who refuse to submit to her arbitrary authority and teachings; or for her position that the Roman Church is the sole channel of grace. Consequently the claim of universal, infallible authority is the heart of Romanism, upon which all else depends.

As scriptural ground for the universal bishopric of the pope, Romanism claims the famous "rock and keys" passage. (Matt. 16 : 18f.) It holds that the word "rock" refers to Peter, whose name means rock, and consequently that Jesus here declares that Peter was to be the foundation of the church. This contention is maintained in spite of various conflicting interpretations of this passage by the Church Fathers, though Romanist theory demands the unanimous consent of the Fathers for its authoritative teaching. But taking the position that the word "rock" refers to Peter himself, the passage does not warrant any such conclusion as Rome makes from it. Jesus merely recognized the leadership which Peter, by his natural personal abilities, had already exercised and was likely to continue to exercise, such a leadership as was manifest in the incident which gave occasion for the Master's words. Any just interpretation of the nature of this leadership thus stated by Jesus must consider the rebuke which the Master administered immediately afterward because of Peter's lack of appreciation of the spiritual nature of Jesus' Messiahship; the denial of Christ by Peter and its inevitable effect upon his standing and influence with the other apostles; Peter's later inability to realize the universal nature of the gospel (Acts 15; Gal. 2 : 11-21); and the position which the New Testament reveals Peter had in the primitive church—a position far from supremacy over others. These considerations make it impossible to infer from the word "rock" the conferring upon Peter of any superior rank or powers. Nor can the Romanist position be maintained by emphasizing the power of the "keys," for this same power of excommunication and declaring on the basis of the gospel the forgiveness of sins was conferred upon all the disciples (John 20 : 22f.) and was indeed recognized as belonging to the whole body of Jesus' followers, the church. (Matt. 18 : 15-20.) There is, therefore, no ground for the contention of Rome that the words "rock" and "keys" in the passage under discussion teach that Peter alone was given a special divine authority and power.⁷

⁶ See larger edition, Appendix, Note 15.

The New Testament definitely contradicts the supposed supremacy of Peter. A number of Jesus' utterances⁸ teach such humility and equality of fellowship and service as are absolutely incompatible with the supposition that he appointed any disciple as the head of all the others with an absolute authority which was to be handed down by him through some particular group of Christ's followers. Many facts also plainly show that Peter did not actually occupy a place of supremacy in the New Testament church. James, who was not even one of the original twelve, was more than Peter preeminently the leader at Jerusalem in the Jewish Christian church. (Acts 15.) Church tradition corroborates the New Testament evidence as to James' position. Among the Gentile Christians Paul was the great and recognized leader. In asserting his apostolic authority Paul declared, "I am not one whit behind the very chiefest apostles" (2 Cor. 11 : 5). Moreover, when certain Judaizers from Jerusalem caused trouble in the church at Antioch, Peter played a subordinate and rather unenviable part. If the contention of Rome were valid, the matter in controversy at this time would have been immediately referred to the supreme Peter, possessor of the infallible teaching faculty. Instead, Paul rebuked Peter to his face. (Gal. 2 : 11-21.) Later, Paul and others went up to Jerusalem, not to Rome, to have the matter discussed by the brethren there in a friendly Christian conference. In this conference Peter set forth his view like any other member of the church, with no show of authority. (Acts 15 : 7-11.) James and Paul were the dominant figures. James, not Peter, suggested the compromise which was agreed upon and according to which Paul was to work among Gentiles while James and Peter were to confine their efforts to Jewish regions. This agreement was set forth, not in the name and on the authority of Peter, but in the name of "the apostles, the elders (pastors or bishops), and the brethren."⁹ In view of these facts given in the New Testament, it is impossible to suppose that the primitive church knew anything of the primacy of Peter or of his possession of any special, not to say universal, authority over the church.

⁷ For two additional passages urged by Romanists, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 16.

⁸ See Mark 9 : 36f.; 10 : 42-45; John 13 : 1-20; Matt. 20 : 27; 23 : 8, 12.

Even if it were granted that the New Testament implies that Peter personally was given some special position and authority, there is no shred of evidence in the New Testament or elsewhere that Peter ever conferred, or was instructed to confer, or had the power to confer, universal authority over the church upon the Roman Church or the bishop of Rome. Consequently, one must conclude that there is no foundation in the teaching or the facts of the New Testament for Rome's claim that the pope is the universal bishop of the Christian church appointed by God with universal authority.

⁹ This agreement was not even in the nature of a decree of a general council. No call to all the bishops or pastors was made, and there is no evidence that such were present except, as they were connected either with the Jerusalem or the Antioch church. Again, it is clear that the laymen had a voice in the agreement, since it is put forth in their name as well as in that of the apostles and elders.

The Romanist claim also lacks any positive historical support.¹⁰ On the other hand, certain facts¹¹ positively disprove the validity of Rome's claim. Many times attempts of the bishop of Rome to assert authority were resisted and the authority denied. Pope Gregory the Great (590-604) rebuked John, patriarch of Constantinople, for assuming the title of "universal bishop," and utterly repudiated any one's claim to such a title or authority. Many facts also concerning the calling of general councils, the presiding over them by emperors rather than by popes, and the confirmation of their decrees by the emperor further illustrate the real situation in the early church as lacking recognition of the pope as universal bishop. The persistent refusal of the Celtic and Eastern churches to acknowledge the supremacy of Rome is another indication. Consequently it is impossible to suppose that the pope has always and universally been recognized as the bishop of the church with supreme authority.

¹⁰ For the Romanist method of arguing from historical data on this point, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 17.

¹¹ For the evidence for this and other conclusions of this paragraph, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 15.

The lack of any ground, scriptural, historical, or reasonable, for the belief in the universal authority of the pope undermines of itself the foundation for the claim of infallibility. But even were we to suppose that the pope possesses universal authority as bishop over all Christendom, it would still be necessary for Romanism to prove that this authority is infallible. Here too, scriptural and historical evidence is lacking. During the first thousand years of Christianity there is no suggestion of such infallibility, and the facts just considered indicate clearly that conviction as to infallibility was entirely wanting. Had such a conviction and recognition existed during that thousand years, history would not tell its story of bitter doctrinal conflicts, for all controversies would have been settled very simply by an appeal to the infallible pope. But actually the church took no such method for settling its difficulties, but rather depended for a long while merely upon the consensus of Christian opinion and then upon the decrees of general councils. Indeed, there is no ground upon which Romanism can support its dogma of infallibility save the mere decree of the Vatican Council (A. D. 1870), which by its virtual annulling of the declaration of the Council of Constance as to the supremacy of the general council over popes invalidates the papal succession since A. D. 1415.

The case of infallibility might be left here in utter collapse for want of evidence, but rejection of it is further warranted by the facts which show the fallibility of the teaching office whether embodied in tradition, the general council, or the pope. In so far as the claim of infallibility rests upon the assumption of the unchangeability of the church's traditional practice and dogmas, it is invalidated by the very development of the bishopric and papacy itself briefly outlined above and the development of the conception of the proper embodiment of the teaching office itself. This conclusion is strengthened by recalling such a well-known fact as the vacillation of the church with reference to permitting the laity the privilege of the cup of the Lord's Supper. Both as a matter of doctrine and of administration the church has maintained both sides of the controversy.

The fallibility of general councils referred to above,¹² as shown by the mutual disagreements of councils, is put beyond question by the circumstances of the Great Schism, which began in A. D. 1378 with a dispute as to which of two rivals was the valid pope and continued with mutually anathematizing popes,¹³ until the Council of Constance (1414-1418). In 1409 the Council of Pisa deposed both popes then reigning and elected a third, but since the two contestants would not abdicate, there were now three popes anathematizing and excommunicating one another. The Council of Constance in 1415 deposed all three—one of whom, however, maintained his contention till his death—and elected a fourth. To validate this action it was necessary for the church to accept the decree of a general council as superior to the authority of the pope. The council, therefore, declared the supremacy of the council. Upon this declaration and action has depended the papal succession since. Yet the Vatican Council, by its own supreme authority as a general council, decreed the supremacy of the pope and his infallible teaching power as a dogma of the church. This reversal and circular argument make it impossible to believe that the general councils have acted unchangeably or infallibly. The subordinating of the decrees of councils to the pope's authority, and also to the selecting function of the teaching office are conclusive admissions that general councils have been fallible.

¹² See footnote on p. 89; also larger edition, Appendix, Note 9.

¹³ The Great Schism does not give us the first example of rival popes, for the boy Pope Benedict X was set up in 1058 in opposition to Pope Stephen IX.

Likewise, abundant evidence shows popes to have been fallible even in statements plainly meant to be ex-cathedra.¹⁴ Popes have disagreed as to the interpretation of Scripture, as, for example, Gregory the Great and Leo XIII in reference to the famous "rock" passage, upon which so much depends for Romanism. Gregory held the word to refer to Peter's confession, which cuts the ground entirely from under the Romanist claim based on this passage. Leo held to the reference to Peter himself. Moreover, popes have been officially declared heretics as to doctrines which they had put forth under their papal authority.¹⁵ In addition, popes have themselves declared that popes are fallible. Benedict laughingly once said, "If it is true that all justice and all truth is hidden in the shrine of my breast, yet I have never been able to find the key to it." It is quite impossible, therefore, to accept the doctrine of the infallibility of the pope.

¹⁴ See larger edition, Appendix, Note 18.

This unscriptural, unhistorical, and unreasonable dogma of infallibility rests solely on the decree of the Vatican Council. An understanding of how this decree was secured strengthens the ground for rejecting it. There was no demand in the Roman Church at large for a pronouncement upon this matter. When, about two generations before the Vatican Council, the reestablished and rehabilitated order of the Jesuits undertook the patronage of this conception, it was merely a pious opinion held by some, but not compulsory for all Romanists. But the Roman Curia was determined to raise this opinion to a dogma of the church, and though there was strong opposition to this exaltation when the Vatican Council gathered, the result was a foregone conclusion. For a while unanimous consent could not be had because of the presence of many strong, able, and active opponents of the pronouncement. However, the voting opposition gradually melted away, for many thought it more prudent to go home than to stay, vote against the decree, and take the consequences. Thus was achieved the declaration of that dogma which is the foundation of Romanism and which every Romanist must believe on pain of eternal damnation. Protestantism repudiates it, not only because it is an unsupported and unwarranted assumption, but also because the application of such a universal and absolute authority by the papacy would, if anything like the application of the past, be too terrible to contemplate were Rome ever again to control the secular force necessary to compel the working of her will.

¹⁵ For a somewhat detailed statement of the evidence, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 18.

Protestantism insists on freedom from this external authority of tradition, councils, and papal declarations, or indeed of any ecclesiastical authority which sets aside or overrules the Scripture. Modern Protestantism affirms with the utmost confidence that authority in religion arises out of the conviction of faith which is the individual soul's response under the guidance of the Holy Spirit to Scripture teaching. For Protestantism, therefore, Scripture¹⁶ is the basis of all religious authority for Christian thinking and life. In contrast with Rome's insistence on the necessity of an infallible teaching organ to interpret Scripture, Protestantism asserts that any one of ordinary intelligence can read the Bible and understand it with sufficient exactness to be led to a saving faith and to a life in accordance with that faith. Yet Protestantism does not teach, as some Romanists seem so often to imply, that each person is to interpret the Scripture as he pleases. Rather each is to interpret as he conscientiously sees the evidence. For this interpretation the reader will have the aid of the Holy Spirit, who has been promised to all who have faith. (John 16 : 13; Rom. 8 : 14.) Moreover, the best available results of scientific scholarship are to be used in reaching a conclusion, but no learned views are compulsory as against conscientious and independent private judgment well based upon evidence. For such use of the Scriptures no infallible interpretative organ is necessary. The teachings of the New Testament lead us to expect, and the experience of multitudes of Christians of all ages proves, that such use of the Scriptures as Protestantism contends for leads to real Christian life. Besides, Protestantism has no fear of losing its case by leaving the Bible open to all or by turning people loose to read and interpret freely as best they can. Indeed, it urges that very process, confident of the outcome.

¹⁶ For the differences in the canon of Scripture recognized by Protestants and Romanists, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 19.

The Protestant use of Scripture does not lead, as Romanists so often contend, to a confusion which makes Protestant churches ineffectual in meeting the religious needs of people. To be sure, there are differences of interpretation among Protestants just as there are among Romanists and have always been among Christians. Difference of interpretation leads inevitably to difference of theological conception, but the differences existing among Protestants are not greater than may be illustrated from the history of the whole church, for there have been many controversies and many changes in doctrine and practice. It is as difficult to make a systematic statement of Romanism by studying tradition, decrees of councils, declarations of popes, and opinions of theologians, and crystallizing the Romanist positions, as it is to get a similar presentation of Protestant teaching. This is true in spite of Rome's claimed power to settle all matters infallibly. But even if there were greater confusion among Protestant theologians, it would not be of such great moment as any difference at all in Romanism is to the Romanist system, for Protestantism does not require an absolutely uniform statement of doctrine. The Protestant conception of faith, as more volitional than intellectual, allows differences of opinion, while it strives for a unity in the spirit of Christ which brings men into living relationship with God. Earnest, conscientious Scripture reading will help bring this unity and general attainment of Christian life.

As a matter of fact, Protestant freedom, instead of leading to endless confusion on account of ignorance, has resulted in a great advance for theological learning. Not only have the greatest theological scholars of the last four hundred years been Protestants, it has been Protestant scholars who have created and carried forward many of the modern theological and biblical sciences.¹⁷ Protestant scholars can seek for the truth unhampered by any controlling ecclesiastical authority, whether they search in the theological and biblical fields or in those of other spheres of knowledge. Romanists are ever subject to the control of the teaching office of the church, and can only find as true what the church approves as such.

The contrast between the spirit of Romanist bondage and Protestant freedom in questions of authority is to be seen in the respective attitudes of Fénelon and Luther. Fénelon, a great seventeenth century leader in France, wrote an edifying book. Through Bossuet, a rival leader, the book was put upon the Index, and a letter of condemnation was sent to Fénelon. The letter arrived just as Fénelon was ascending the pulpit. He at once changed his sermon, and declared the necessity of submitting to the pope, though he was not yet informed as to why his book was condemned. He forbade any one to read the book, and had burned such copies as he could secure. All of this he did without having presented to his own mind any reasons for changing the statements of his book save the command of the pope. What a contrast to Luther at ¹⁷ See larger edition, Appendix, Note 20.

Worms! There the humble Wittenberg monk stood true to his conscientious convictions in spite of the presence of the great personages of the empire and church, including the emperor himself, and in spite of the fact that the pope had already excommunicated him. He made no recantation as was demanded, and when he declared, "Here stand I; I can do nought else, God help me," he gave an immortal epitome of Protestant freedom in contrast to Romanist compulsion and restriction of conscience.

And, after all, Romanism is in the end forced to the same place practically as Protestantism. Even in order to yield to the authority of Rome, unless one acts blindly one must first be convinced by the use of his private, individual judgment of the justice of Rome's claims to power. Else, why do Romanists make any argument at all. If private judgment and freedom is valid for accepting Romanism, so is it for rejecting it in part or in whole. Thus the entire question boils down to this, whether in reaching out for God and his life one must come to Rome and take what she says just because she says it, or, on the other hand, shall go to the Scripture for guidance and use all other corroborating evidence which is available, and then in a reasonable way reach a conclusion. Protestantism with the modern world accepts the latter method, and Rome is herself compelled to employ it in appealing for acceptance of her claims.

Quiz

1. What is Rome's claim to an infallible teaching office? 2. What is the consequent attitude of Rome toward the use of Scripture? 3. What does Rome claim as to the authority of tradition, and how does she nullify that authority? 4. What is the claim as to the authority of the general council, and how is that authority now viewed? 5. What is the supreme authority in the Roman Church? 6. What is Rome's theory of the infallible faculty of the pope? 7. What is the proper significance of the "rock" passage in the discussion of the universal authority of the pope? 8. What are the facts in the New Testament which make the Romanist claim impossible? 9. Is there any evidence that Peter ever transmitted any special power? 10. What are some of the historical facts which make the Romanist claim of universal authority impossible? 11. What are the evidences of fallibility of tradition, councils, and popes? 12. What is the significance of the Vatican Council? 13. What is the Protestant attitude toward authority and freedom? 14. Is there a measure of agreement among Protestants? 15. What has been the effect of freedom upon learning?

Suggestions for Further Study

1. Can one be free in the Protestant sense and accept the authority of the Scripture? 2. The difference between the canon of the Romanists and of the Protestants. 3. The greater freedom of Romanists in this country as compared with those in other lands. 4. The freer use of Scriptures by Romanists in this country as compared with those in other lands.

CHAPTER VII

FAITH THE SUFFICIENT MEANS OF GRACE

IN contrast to Romanism, Protestants teach a broad inclusiveness of the Christian church, as has already been stated. Many Roman Catholics, including some recognized teachers, admit, as do all intelligent persons, the reprehensibility of bigotry, and entertain the broader view that Protestants who are faithful to their convictions may be saved. In this opinion they are broader and more charitable than their church. Nothing can be clearer in Romanist teaching than the authoritative declarations as to Rome's sole possession of the channel of grace.¹ "As the Fourth Lateran Council puts it, 'Out of the church no man is saved.'"² The Syllabus of Errors (1864) condemns the error that "we may entertain at least a well-founded hope for the eternal salvation of all those who are in no manner in the true church of Christ." These and many other authoritative statements show what the Romanist position is.

No refutation of such a position is necessary for a modern mind, but it is worth while calling attention to the invalidity of the appeal of the Romanist argument to certain passages of Scripture. These passages refer to the exclusion of some members by the New Testament church. They certainly imply that there are just grounds for excluding church-members. But there is not the slightest hint that mere difference of theological opinions, which in themselves are not incompatible with loyalty to Christ, and God, are such grounds, and, least of all, is there any support for supposing that difference from the Roman Church is ground for excluding men from communion with God.

¹ See larger edition, Appendix, Note 21.

² Quoted by Coppens, p. 69.

If any one supposes that this position of Rome is only an old one, no longer really held, let him recall the claim of Rome to unchangeability.³ Let him estimate the significance also of the following Romanist statements. Cardinal Gibbons says, "The Catholic Church alone teaches doctrines which are in all respects identical with those of the first teachers of the gospel." Such bigotry is for Romanists only faithfulness to their convictions, as Coppens states: "Those who teach that in religious matters every one should judge for himself are irrational and bigoted when they condemn the belief of others; but whoever believes in 'one fold and one shepherd' must look upon schism and heresy as most deplorable evils; and the commissioned guardian of the 'one faith' must denounce all who assail its unity." Accordingly, the bigots are those who, while holding and stating strong convictions, nevertheless are sufficiently broad to be charitable toward those who differ from them in religious matters, while the unbigoted attitude is that of denunciation of all who differ. Romanists seem entirely oblivious of the fact that their own statement makes their consistency the most bigoted position possible.

³ See larger edition, Appendix, Note 21.

Coppens also says: "Though many of their members [Protestant sects] no doubt lead good lives according to their imperfect lights, few claim heroism or miracles, and their doctrines of faith or justification do not tend to holiness. Of course the exceptional virtue of a few would not be a mark of the holiness of their sect." This statement is made apparently in all seriousness in a work which is intended to be a text-book on Romanist teaching for the use of Romanist young people. A similar absurdity is the statement of Perrone: "The more innocent the life of a Catholic is, the more clearly he adheres to his church; while his attachment becomes looser in proportion as he surrenders himself to depraved habits. On the other hand, a Protestant, the more depraved his heart and unrestrained his life, clings so much the closer to his sect; whereas the more distinguished he is for blamelessness of morals the more doubtful he becomes as to the truth of his sect, and so comes over to the Catholic religion." All of this is nonsense, and reveals that Romanists who formally set out Romanist ideas are as ignorant of Protestants and Protestantism as some irresponsible Protestants are with reference to Romanists and Romanism. Even a Romanist could address the Vatican Council thus: "The Saviour practised in word and deed gentleness, meekness, forgiveness. What do we do as opposed to this? What is demanded of us? We condemn; we put on the Index; we shriek, 'Heresy, Schism!'" Such a remonstrance shows that narrowness persists in Romanism and official Romanists down to the present.

How much more in keeping with the spirit of the New Testament and with the modern mind is the broad view of Protestantism! This view not only appeals by its breadth, but it also assures by the certainty which it gives as to spiritual life. Thus Protestantism reaches the goal which Romanism with its entire conception of the church and its authority does not.

The crowning consideration of Rome is that only in the one true Catholic Church, with her divinely ordained priesthood and apostolic succession and with her infallible authority, can religious certainty be had. But in view of such a claim, what shall we say of the fact that Luther, while still a most sincere, devout, earnest, and loyal son of the church, could find no certainty in all the Romanist system to satisfy the need of his soul? What shall we say of the similar experience of Loyola, the founder of the Jesuits, who could find no spiritual satisfaction until, like Luther, he had personally surrendered to God through faith? What shall we say too, of the declaration of Romanists that no one can be sure of his personal salvation? What shall we say of the teaching that the very infallibility of the pope eludes us unless we can be certain that the pope intended an utterance as infallible, whether he stated his intention or not? How shall the ordinary Christian be without doubt when, for example, Cardinal Manning declares that the "syllabus of 1864 was part of the supreme and infallible teaching of the Church," but Cardinal Newman was of the opinion that it was of "no dogmatic force"? What shall we say of the fact that, despite claimed infallible power to teach, no full and comprehensive codification of the teachings of Romanism has ever been put forth by the infallible teaching magisterium, but all, in and out of the church, are left to gather the church's teaching from the various authoritative sources? Why has the Roman Curia with its infallible power studiously avoided, so far as can be judged, pronouncements upon matters in dispute between various orders, such as the Dominicans and Franciscans? Or, what shall we say of the doctrine of intention? If the grace of the sacraments is conveyed only when the priest so intended, as Romanism holds, how can the recipient be sure of the unannounced intention of the priest, and how, then, can he be sure that he has received this grace without which he must be lost and for the certainty of whose reception the entire Romanist system exists? And, further, how does this doctrine of intention affect the certainty of the entire Romanist structure, since, at some vital point or points of the transmission of apostolic succession, a bishop may not have intended to convey grace? Perrone answers this question, as in the end every Romanist must answer all questions of certainty, when he says we "must trust Providence." But in such an answer Romanism comes over to the Protestant ground of certainty, namely, faith in God. Thus the boasted certainty of the infallible system of Romanism turns out to be a slippery, elusive thing and ends in a confession of the worth of the Protestant basis of surety in religion.

Protestant teaching affirms that when men take toward God the attitude of faith, there comes a fellowship with God which in itself begets religious certainty. There is no surer certainty than that which arises out of one's own experience. So Paul's statement, "The Spirit himself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are children of God" (Rom. 8 : 16), becomes in part the scriptural ground of that certainty which every possessor of faith in God may attain in his own personal experience. Among other passages which base certainty in faith is Jesus' utterance, "He that heareth my words, and believeth (hath faith in) him that sent me, hath eternal life, and cometh not into judgment, but hath passed out of death into life" (John 5 : 24). The simple fact which the history of Christianity, and particularly of the Protestant churches, reveals is that millions of men have out of their simple faith in God as their Father come to a certainty of their relationship to him controlling for life. What better certainty is needed? Surely no other kind can issue in more practical Christian living than has been manifested in Protestant character and church work. Romanism fails utterly to secure certainty in any sense, while Protestantism at least has found the way to certainty sufficient for Christian living. It is this kind of certainty that the New Testament gives and the world needs.

Quiz

1. Does Rome actually claim to be the only agency of salvation?
2. What is the alleged Scripture basis for this claim?
3. Is this claim still maintained?
4. What is the elusive claim of Rome to certainty?
5. What is the ground of certainty for Protestants?

Suggestions for Further Study

1. Your personal experiences with Romanists in regard to the claim as to the sole channel of grace.
2. The possible directions in which Romanism might be invalidated by supposing the lack of intention on the part of any official in transmitting grace.
3. The basis of certainty in any vital matter.
4. Do Protestants possess the consciousness of certainty as to religious welfare?

CHAPTER VIII

ROMANIST DEFORMITIES

FOR the sake of leaving undisturbed the progress of the main lines of thought in the preceding chapters, some matters have been left to be considered here which are really connected with various preceding discussions. One of these is the Protestant estimate of monasticism and its vows.

Monasticism is not of Christian origin, but has existed in paganism before and after Christ. It connects very directly with the doctrine of salvation by meritorious works. Monastic vows are works of supererogation, and the many religious activities advised and required by the Church are additional meritorious works for which the monk has more time than others. Chateaubriand, the French author and statesman, once said, "I have not reached the goal; I have not put on the monk's cowl." The Romanist ideal of piety is the piety of "the religious" in the cloister, and those outside must be contented with a lesser piety than is possible for these.

Undoubtedly monks and the like have always possessed more time than others for the activities which Romanism has regarded as pious. But Protestantism does not regard these activities highly for the reasons stated above in the chapter on legalism. In medieval times monastic orders were, to be sure, of real value to agriculture in the reclamation of land and in the development of agricultural knowledge; to literature, in preserving and copying manuscripts; to art, in a number of ways; to Christian missions, and to education. These, however, were not the main but the incidental reasons for the existence of the orders. Moreover, the orders invariably became rich, and their riches corrupted them; thus was the vow of poverty brought to nought. Also, these institutions which were intended to take the sex relation out of the physical realm and make of it a spiritual and etherealized, beautiful thing came to be, because of inherent tendencies, the center of moral corruption which had in the Reformation time gone beyond description and modern belief. Thus was celibacy negatived in the monastery's most prosperous period. In one order at least, that of the Jesuits, which now seems to dominate Romanism, the vow of obedience worked out to such an impossible moral code and to such vicious activities that even Rome itself could not abide the order.¹ Clement XIV, in 1773, dissolved it, and it did not secure restoration until 1814. In addition to these failures of monasticism in its essential aims, the monasteries have been the seats of the grossest superstitious ideas and practices. Surely the balance between the good and evil of them must be considered to weigh heavily toward evil.

¹ The Jesuits have been expelled from time to time from nearly every Roman Catholic country in the world, and from all of the European lands.

But the main objection of Protestantism to monasticism is that the monastic ideal is against nature and contrary to the example of Jesus and the apostles who lived strongly in the common walks of life. If an ideal is really such, it ought to bear universal application; but thus to apply one element of monasticism, namely, celibacy, would depopulate the world. The truest and highest type of Christian life is achieved, not in the shelter of the cloister, but in the hot struggle of every-day living. Furthermore, Protestantism holds as immoral the taking of irrevocable vows at a young, tender, and unsophisticated age,² for this puts the future in fetters. At such an age, or indeed at what age, is such a relinquishment of life and its opportunities for developing character by struggle in the world justifiable? A real morality will give men certain fundamental and guiding principles as a basis of life, yet will leave them free to meet the changing exigencies of human existence. The ideal of the Christian in the world, freely fighting the battle of life with God's help on the basis of Jesus' actual teaching and in his spirit of faith in God, Protestantism urges over against the monastic ideal of Romanism.

² Rome names sixteen for boys and twelve for girls.

One of the practices of the monks and other Romanists has been veneration and invocation of the saints. This practice began quite early in the history of the church after the fate of martyrs came to impress deeply the minds of Christians. Later the achievement of any special virtue was enough to raise a prominent person to a kind of veneration. When canonization of saints came under regulation, other marks, such as the working of at least two miracles, were required. In later times political influences and payments of money had their part in the final decision as to canonization which rested with the pope. Some Romanists conceive that the pope is merely guided to declare the exaltation to sainthood which heaven has already decreed. Others consider that the pope's decision exalts, so that through the authority to canonize the pope controls the blessings of heaven as through the power of indulgences he controls the torments of purgatory. Canonized saints are to be venerated and their intercession with God on behalf of the supplicators is to be invoked because deemed valuable just as a friend's prayers in this world are worthful, only the influence of the saints with God is much greater than an earthly friend's can be. Veneration and invocation of the saints are not compulsory, yet, because of the authoritative statements of the church, every Romanist must believe in these practices though not following them, and if any one renounces them he incurs Rome's displeasure.

Protestantism rejects veneration and invocation of the saints in the first place because there is no scriptural ground for it. Leaving aside the one apocryphal passage (2 Macc. 12 : 43f.), which Protestantism does not accept as Scripture since it is not a part of the Scripture canon,³ Cardinal Gibbons' asserted wealth of quoted Scripture is almost entirely instances of men in this world praying for one another, and the rest is so far beside the mark that it does not need discussion. Protestantism, moreover, urges that no one knows whether those who have gone to the other world can hear and comply with the requests made of them by those in this world. Cajetan, the frank and great debater against Luther on behalf of Rome, said, "We have no certain knowledge as to whether the saints are aware of our prayers, although we piously believe it." Protestantism also avers that this practice seems to arise out of a misconception of God which appears to be characteristic of Romanism, namely, that like an Oriental monarch God is difficult of approach and is to be reached by his children only in some indirect way. In truth God will gladly hear any of his children. In the New Testament Jesus Christ is made the only mediator between God and men, and the significance of this mediatorship is a very different one from that of the saints as conserved by Romanism.

But it is against the inevitable development of the simpler Romanist veneration and invocation into an actual worship and a real polytheism that Protestantism most strongly protests. It is very difficult to keep in mind the distinction, nicely drawn by Romanist thinkers, between venerating the saints and venerating the Christ reflected in them. The common man really venerates and invokes the saint. Nor can he maintain the distinction of the theologians in holding that "latria" is worship of God, "dulia" veneration of the saints, and "hyperdulia" the intermediate veneration given to Mary. These distinctions in the attitudes of worship inevitably fade in practice. Veneration and invocation of the saints thus becomes an actual worship of saints which cannot be distinguished practically from worship of God. At least the prayers to the saints are often such as might be directed to God himself,⁴ for they are petitions to be answered directly by the saints and not by God at the intercession of the saints. Thus saint-worship degenerates into a kind of polytheism in which the saints are supposed to have good and evil influences over the various affairs of men. In consequence all but incredible superstition has inevitably followed.⁵ On account of this degeneration Protestantism rightly repudiates veneration and invocation of the saints.

³ See larger edition, Appendix, Note 19.

But Protestants were not the first to oppose such superstition and idolatry. Peter refused to allow

⁴ For examples, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 22.

⁵ See Von Hase's "Handbook."

Cornelius to fall down and worship him. (Acts 10 : 25.) The men of Lystra attempted to make sacrifices to Barnabas and Paul, but were rebuked. (Acts 14 : 12-15.) Paul says (Col. 2 : 18), "Let no man rob you of your prize by worshiping of the angels." According to the book of Revelation (19 : 10 and 22 : 8f.), John himself is represented as being rebuked for attempting to worship an angel. Tertullian and Augustine spoke out against this practice, and through the centuries there has been considerable additional opposition, even among Romanists. Protestants therefore have for their rejection of veneration and invocation of the saints most excellent warrant in the scriptural writers and the Church Fathers.

The climax of saint-worship is the cult of Mary, which is open to precisely the same objection as all other saint-worship and in an increased degree because of the exaggerated titles applied to her and the wide range of requests which she is asked to answer.⁶ But this is not the entire indictment of Protestantism against the worship of Mary. The complete dogma concerning Mary, which is a peculiarly Romanist conception unacceptable to all the rest of Christendom, holds that Mary was immaculately conceived, that is, without original sin with which all other human beings save Jesus have been born; that she was sinless herself; that she remained perpetually a virgin; that she possesses attributes well-nigh, if not completely, divine; and that she is an intercessor with God and her son Jesus on behalf of her worshipers. Of Mary's sinlessness there is no hint in the New Testament, though Jesus is so depicted. The supposition that Mary remained perpetually a virgin is in direct contradiction of the passages in the New Testament which refer to Jesus' natural brothers and sisters. (Matt. 12 : 46; Mark 3 : 31; 6 : 3; Luke 8 : 19; John 2 : 12; 7 : 3, 5.) The New Testament gives no trace of Mary's immaculate conception. Yet Heinrich,⁷ while admitting candidly the lack of scriptural support for the dogma concerning Mary, actually asserts on the claim of the unrestricted power of the church that the dogma is stronger because there is no scriptural evidence. He says: "Ecclesiastical science stands under the direction of the infallible teaching office of the Church. . . We are at this point in a better case than we are when by means of purely exegetical helps we arrive, more or less immediately, at an article of faith as the contents of any text of Holy Scripture." Nor is there any positively historical support for the dogma. On the other hand, it is positively opposed by such great Fathers as Saint Augustine, Saint Bernard, and Saint Thomas Aquinas. Consequently, unless one is willing to accept the mere assertion of the Roman Curia, there is absolutely no reason for assenting to this doctrine concerning Mary.

⁶ For examples of titles and prayers, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 23.

⁷ Quoted by Foster.

The manner of promulgating the dogma discredits it. The Franciscans and Dominicans had quarreled over its validity for centuries, and no council has passed upon its truth. The Council of Trent was discreetly silent. But Pius IX, without any wide-spread demand in the church for a pronouncement upon the subject, proclaimed the dogma by his own infallible power which he was then asserting. Apparently the promulgation of this dogma was made as a test as to whether his authority, unsupported by the decree of a general council, would be accepted. Later the Vatican Council, in decreeing the infallibility of the pope, affirmed as a consequence this pronouncement. To-day a loyal Romanist must believe it, not because it can be proved to be true, but because the pope has declared it is true. In rejecting⁸ this unsupported and incredible doctrine, Protestants wonder at the credulity of Romanists.

Analogous to saint-worship is the veneration of images of Christ, Mary, and the saints. This is not to be confused with actual worship. Virtue is attributed, not to the images, but only to those who are represented. But here again the common practice of the people cannot maintain the theoretical distinction. The tendency to venerate the concrete image is inevitable and is furthered by the formula of presentation by the priest, "Come, let us adore." Such a practice ought to have been prevented by the use of the second of the Ten Commandments, especially as the English Douai Version renders this commandment thus: "Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven thing. . . Thou shalt not adore them, nor serve them" (Exod. 20 : 4-6). Romanist writers feel the difficulty, for their editions of the Ten Commandments are numbered differently from those used by Protestants in order to make up for their omission of the entire second commandment just quoted.⁹ Not only the Scriptures, but also the early Fathers from Justin Martyr to Origen abhorred image-worship. In later years and centuries a struggle against their use took place.¹⁰ Yet the Council of Trent, which expressly set up the standard of the unanimous consent of the Fathers, approved veneration of images. Protestantism rejects this practice both because of the teaching of Scripture and also because of the superstition which always results from it.

⁸ The doctrine is also rejected by the Eastern Catholic Church.

Another piece of Romanist externality is connected with the doctrine concerning penance, namely, indulgences. Since the church is supposed to have in penance the power of inflicting penalties for and so meeting temporal punishment¹¹ of sin, ⁹ See an edition widely used in the British Isles and one in "The Catholic Faith—A Compendium, authorized by Pius IX," p. 43. These are referred to by R. J. Miller, p. 147.

¹⁰ See, for conciliar action, larger edition, Appendix, Note 9.

¹¹ For a definition of temporal punishment, see p. 48 fu.

she is also held to have the power of removing these penalties and of pardoning temporal punishment itself. Cardinal Gibbons says, "An indulgence is simply a remission in whole or in part, through the superabundant merits of Jesus Christ and his saints, of the temporal punishment due to God on account of sin, after the guilt and eternal punishment have been remitted." For example, by the gift of alms to the poor or by a gift of money to the church, a certified check, so to speak, is obtained on the treasury of merits laid up by Christ and by the supererogatory works of the saints. This credit is sufficient to remit by virtue of an indulgence temporal punishment in this world and in purgatory. In view of the great trouble stirred up in the past on account of indulgences,¹² promulgations and sales on a large scale have for a long time been avoided by Rome. Yet indulgences are still granted. For example, by the indulgence set forth by the Holy League of the Sacred Heart of Jesus an adulterer will secure, by merely wearing a prescribed badge upon the lapel of his coat at mass on Sunday morning, as great merit as under the very ancient penitential system of voluntary penitential acts such a one could secure by seven years and seven times forty days of most rigorous penitential practices, such as standing among the weepers outside the church door clothed in penitential garments.

¹² It is to be recalled that John Hus in Bohemia, and one hundred years later Martin Luther in Germany, broke with Rome over this matter.

According to papal indulgences the climbing of the holy staircase in Rome in Holy Week earns nine years' indulgence for each step climbed; or, the mere act of kissing the cross in the Colosseum earns one hundred days' indulgence. Such trifling with sacred ideas is almost unbelievable on the part of sensible people, much less would we suppose that the members of the hierarchy, which claims to have a monopoly on salvation and religious knowledge, would be guilty of such absurdities.

The Scriptures have absolutely no support for the doctrine of indulgences. Saint Thomas Aquinas, the greatest of the mediæval Romanist theologians, makes various explanations of their validity, but finally comforts himself with the assertion that it would be conceded by all that indulgences were worth something, seeing that it would be impious to say that the church does anything in vain. That is about as much as the doctrine has to build on. Protestants condemn indulgences for their lack of basis in Scripture or reason, for their unethical externality and triviality, and for their inevitable connection with the commercialism and abuses which have always marked their promulgation and sale on a large scale.

Consideration of indulgences naturally suggests purgatory, which is the state of existence after death in which the soul is prepared for heaven by a process of purging from the sin that may still adhere to one at death. Cardinal Gibbons and the Catholic Encyclopedia give examples of arguments which seek to base the conception of purgatory on Scripture. But this same encyclopedia very frankly sets such arguments aside in this declaration: "We would appeal to those general principles of Scripture rather than to particular texts often alleged in proof of purgatory. We doubt if they contain an explicit and direct reference to it." This ought to be sufficient even for the Romanists to see that there is no definite scriptural ground for belief in purgatory.

Absence of Scripture is not the only objection to the idea of purgatory. The assumption that penalties remain to be met after sin is forgiven is a narrowing of God's willingness to forgive, whereas the Scripture teaches that peace of mind and assurance of forgiveness come through faith. Moreover, the doctrine is self-contradictory. Romanist theologians argue that purgatory is a real blessing, since it is an opportunity for preparing for heaven by purificatory suffering. But if purgatorial suffering is a blessing, why should it be arbitrarily shortened? Purgatory cannot be at the same time a blessing to be desired and a curse to be shunned, to avoid whose punishments masses must be said and indulgences granted. If a surgical operation is a real blessing, it would be foolish to pay the surgeon to shorten arbitrarily the process without whose completion the benefit could not be wrought, and instead have him declare that the blessing had been effected. Yet precisely similar is the idea of shortening purgatorial purifying by the arbitrary introduction of ecclesiastical decrees and the like.

Unscriptural and inconsistent, the doctrine as to purgatory is also very uncertain. The uncertainty connected with it leads to great evil. In spite of Rome's great claims to religious knowledge and certainty in general, nothing is more uncertain than hopes concerning purgatory. No one can tell who is there, how long they will stay, nor how many masses, prayers, and indulgences will get them out. The one certain thing is that the believer may keep on paying for masses and prayers as long as he will. This situation has been the prolific cause of the evils due to the doctrine of purgatory. These are scandals connected with prayers for the dead: the commercialized exploitation of the grief of people in order to get them to pay for prayers; the consequent deadening of the moral and religious sensibilities of the priests who devote most of their time to this; the mechanical weighing of so many masses for so much money over against so much purgatorial suffering; the extortions which have been practised; the fears which have been played upon in order to yield a rich revenue for avaricious ecclesiastics and for a needy hierarchy; and the superstitions which have been promoted by the fear of purgatory. The idea of purgatory and all that accompanies it seems to Protestants to be a part of that superstitious side-religion which was mentioned above.¹³

Another element of Romanism akin to purgatory and indulgences is the estimate of pilgrimages as meritorious acts by which indulgences applying to purgatory and other supposed advantages may be gained. Undoubtedly some places in the world, because of their association with great men or great experiences, may well be worth a visit. Indeed, it is readily conceivable that such a visit, accompanied by real piety and the religious meditations aroused by a particular set of associations, may issue in real religious aid. Any spiritual value, however, arises quite entirely from the inner attitude and thought of the pilgrim. Pilgrimages merely as such have no merit, and they have in the past too easily given occasion for superstitious ideas and practices where the presence of God or of some saint, especially Mary, has been localized for the purpose of attracting people, or some image or statue has been all but deified, and where magical power has been attributed to tombs and other special places. Protestantism, therefore, affirms that pilgrimages have no saving merit, since faith, not external action, is the basis of God's forgiveness.

¹³ In view of the real situation Cardinal Gibbons' statement is both astounding and absurd in implying ignorance on the part of Protestants who reject purgatory: "Now the same motive which you have for rejecting the opinion of an ignorant politician, and embracing that of eminent jurists on a constitutional question, impels you to cast aside the novelties of religious innovators, and to follow the unanimous sentiments of the Fathers in reference to the subject of purgatory."

The situation is very similar with reference to relics, the honor paid them, and the expectations of help from them. Mementoes are interesting in proportion to the importance of the person or place to whom or to which the memento is attached. But when supernatural power which is no other than magical is attributed to various relics, and when revenue is thus secured, it is out of the question to avoid fraud as to identity of the relic and as to its alleged characteristics and powers.¹⁴ The frauds and superstitions connected with relics, as Von Hase points out, have been possible only with the connivance of priests and nuns, and indeed the pope himself has taken a hand in encouraging the use of relics. The Council of Trent gave specific command for bishops with due regard for validity to instruct the faithful in honoring them. As long as any given relics have attracted people and have yielded a revenue, their use has been permitted in spite of very uncertain, not to say false, identity. Protestantism from the beginning, chiefly because it bases religion in faith and not in performing certain external, supposedly meritorious acts, but also because of the frauds and superstitions connected with the use of relics, has refused to allow that honoring them or in any way using them constitutes a religious act.

¹⁴ Von Hase's account of frauds and superstitions connected with honoring of relics makes interesting reading in the field of legerdemain and human credulity and gullibility. The present writer knows of the selling, in recent years, of charms and amulets by a priest.

Quiz

1. What is the ideal, the value, and the evil of monasticism? 2. What is veneration of the saints, and what are the grounds of Protestant rejection? 3. What is the Romanist teaching concerning Mary? 4. What are the grounds of the Protestant rejection of this teaching? 5. What is the Protestant attitude toward veneration of images? 6. What is the Romanist conception of indulgences, and why do Protestants reject this conception? 7. What is purgatory? 8. What are the Protestant objections to the doctrine of purgatory? 9. What is the Protestant attitude toward relics and pilgrimages?

Suggestions for Further Study

1. Is there any place for monasticism in modern life? 2. Can one pray to any person without worshipping? 3. Your personal knowledge of Romanist practices in connection with veneration of saints, Mary, relics, and places of pilgrimage. 4. Present use of indulgences. 5. The system of paying for prayers to be said by proxy now in use among some Romanists. 6. Superstitious practices in vogue among Romanists coming under your personal observations or found in your reading.

CHAPTER IX

WORSHIP AND FREEDOM

SOME further implications of Protestantism may be seen in a comparison of Romanist and Protestant worship. Public worship in a Romanist church¹ is chiefly the mass which, together with the communion, is really a prolonged observance of the Lord's Supper. Incense is used. As the mass is said in the Latin language, the people can only follow the actions of the priest and acolytes, and at the designated moment adore the elevation of the "host." So far from the ceremony, except at the moment of the elevation, are the minds of the worshipers that it is not uncommon to see them telling their beads during the mass, depending apparently upon its supposed divine effect without any reference to their entering consciously into the ceremony. Thus they kill two birds with one stone. Sermons are preached, but not always, and occupy relatively a very much less important and effective place than in Protestant churches. Romanist worship appeals to those who must worship through the outward and sensuous covered with a more or less thin veil of estheticism. It is this, perhaps, which explains its hold upon the masses of people who tend in the direction of externals rather than of the inwardly spiritual.

¹ The communion is participated in by only a comparatively few at any one time, so that for most people the mass is the whole of the service.

Protestant worship has no mass, and regards incense as pagan. It is in most branches of Protestantism less ornate than in Romanism, though to-day many Protestant churches show a marked tendency to give larger place to ritualistic impressiveness in public worship. If Protestant worship is less spectacularly impressive, the lack of ornateness is more than compensated for by those features which are given more effective use by Protestants or are entirely lacking in Romanism. The sermon is perhaps the outstanding feature of Protestant services, and through it a larger place is given to the intellectual interest and to direct moral appeal than in Romanist worship. Elements of Protestant worship entirely lacking in Romanism are congregational singing; public Scripture reading by the minister and by the people either responsively or in unison; and the impromptu public prayer, characteristic of most Protestant churches, in which the Protestant minister fulfils the true priestly function of lifting up the people to God by expressing for them their innermost aspirations, their faith, and their spirit of sacrifice. Besides the regular church services, Protestants also have public worship in the Bible school in public prayer, in Bible reading, and in congregational singing. The prayer-meeting, which is conducted by most Protestant churches, includes the elements of worship already mentioned and two others for which Romanism has no counterpart, namely, the worship through social fellowship and interchange of Christian experiences, and the practice of the priesthood of all believers in the public praying and speaking of laymen. Finally, Protestant worship, in its effort to express and arouse individual faith, rests on the fundamental Protestant emphasis of faith and upon the democracy of religious experience, while Romanist worship rests upon the assumption of a divinely appointed ecclesiastical institution which is the sole channel of divine grace.

It is not surprising, therefore, that Protestantism and Romanism differ in their views of the necessity of church attendance. Romanism requires, as absolutely necessary, attendance upon mass at least once a year. Coppens declares that the first commandment of the church is "to hear Mass on Sundays and holy days of obligation." He argues in a legalistic way that this commandment takes the place of that one of the Ten Commandments of the Mosaic code which says, "Remember the sabbath day to keep it holy." The Romanist goes to church, therefore, first of all because it is legally required by the church and not voluntarily for the purpose of personal, inner communion with God and of deepening faith and fellowship with God the Father. Mere attendance on the mass, with or without an inner attitude of faith or seeking of God, secures divine grace for the removal of guilt and eternal punishment of sin and for strengthening the moral life.

Protestants also think of church attendance as a duty and a privilege, but without the legalism and externalism of Romanism. One who has real faith will recognize the duty of maintaining public worship and the whole work of the church, which is the institution under God's guidance to give religious and moral instruction, to inspire Christian life, and to bring in the kingdom of God. True faith will also feel the need of the public worship which nourishes individual Christian life. A man cannot be as good a Christian without as with the aid which the church alone can give. But one's relations to the church in all its functions must be voluntary. The good received depends upon the responsive faith of each one who associates himself with the church. A true Protestant will believe that the religious help received by Romanists by their attendance upon church depends likewise on the inner attitude of the attendants.

As to alleged smaller attendance of Protestants, it would be possible to reply that Romanist attendance is so much due to the desire to meet the mere external demand of the legal requirement that it does not amount to so much spiritually as the more voluntary attendance upon Protestant churches, which is based on the impulsion of inner faith.

Besides, the favorable estimate as to Romanist attendance is based upon the surface consideration of the comparatively crowded condition of the Romanist churches on Sundays. This consideration does not take into account the difference in policy followed by Protestant and Romanist churches in regard to the supplying of seating capacity. According to the United States Census of 1906, the last of its kind to date, Protestant churches have over twice as many seats as communicants, while Romanist churches have nearly three times as many communicants as seats. Consequently, for Protestant churches to be as crowded as Romanist churches, it would be necessary for Protestants to be 6.39 times as numerous as they are now. Thus it may be shown that Protestants can have nearly five and one-half seats empty to one filled and still have relatively as many people coming to church at any one time as the Romanists. This consideration is quite sufficient to explain the seeming disparity between the church attendance of Protestants and Romanists.

However, though the disparagement of Protestant loyalty in this discussion makes necessary such a statement as the foregoing, it is regrettable, if brotherliness between Protestants and Romanists is to be cultivated, that such innuendoes, aimed at the sincerity of people in either communion, should be made. No group of Christians has a monopoly of goodness and loyalty to Christ and none is free from the shallow, ignorant, half-hearted examples of people of little faith. It is only ignorance or bigoted prejudice that attempts to cast aspersions upon the sincerity of the bulk of the people or to underestimate the piety and religious accomplishments in either communion. It would be well for our land if Protestants and Romanists, while loyal respectively to their own convictions and teaching them freely, would nevertheless attempt to understand their essential differences and common beliefs, agree to disagree about the things upon which agreement is impossible, and live together in peace and mutual respect. The very principles of Protestants require them to take this attitude, to allow their cause to stand or fall on its merits, and to have no fear of the outcome. Whether this is possible for Romanism with its exclusive system Protestants will have to leave to Romanists and their teachers and to the judgment of the unbiased.

The attitude just referred to is the fruit of Protestant freedom, which has had several important issues. One of these is religious liberty, which is so characteristic of American Christianity and which has constituted a marked contribution of the United States to the world. Against religious liberty the authoritative teaching of Romanism is unequivocal, though some Romanists in this country seem reluctant to accept this teaching. Gregory XVI, in his pastoral letter of 1832, exhorts to the conflict with indifference, and designates as such the idea that salvation can be had outside of a right relation to the pope: "From this unclean spring of indifference there flows that idea, or rather that madness, that every one is to be accorded liberty of conscience. This destructive illusion is the result of that profitless freedom of ideas, which extends its ravages in all directions to the ruin of the State and the Church, while some have the shamelessness to say that some benefit results from it to religion. . . For it is a familiar fact in the experience of all nations that the most flourishing states have come to ruin through this one evil, through the immoderate freedom of ideas, through the license accorded to public utterances, through the inordinate desire for novelties. To this also appertains what cannot be sufficiently reprobated, the freedom of the press, which some venture to demand." Pius IX went even further in his denunciations of religious liberty, demanding that freedom of worship, of conscience and thought be done away, that the church be allowed to control individuals in these spheres, and that all matters of marriage be turned over to the church. He was artless enough to expect that the world would turn back to such doctrine. Leo XIII, in his encyclical letter of June 20, 1888, said, "It is in no wise permitted to demand, defend, or grant liberty of thought, or of the press, or of teaching, or of religion."²

² For Cardinal Gibbons' attitude toward religious liberty, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 24.

In view of the Romanist teaching, therefore, and also in view of the actual facts in the case, it is almost unbelievable that Cardinal Gibbons has claimed that the Roman Catholic colony of Maryland was the first to establish religious liberty and thus implied that we owe this precious possession to Rome.³ The true state of the case as to the establishment of religious liberty in this country is set forth by L. W. Bacon, a Congregationalist. He says:⁴ "In the establishment of the American principle of the non-interference of the state with religion, and the equality of all religious communions before the law, much was due, no doubt, to the mutual jealousies of the sects, no one or two of which were strong enough to maintain exceptional pretensions over the rest. . . So far as this work was a work of intelligent conviction and religious faith, the chief honor must be given to the Baptists. Other sects, notably the Presbyterians, had been energetic and efficient in demanding their own liberties; the Friends and Baptists agreed in demanding liberty of conscience and worship, and equality before the law, for all alike. But the active labor in this cause was mainly done by the Baptists. It is to their consistency and constancy in the warfare against the privileges of the powerful 'Standing Order' of New England, and of the moribund establishments of the South, that we are chiefly indebted for the final triumph, in this country, of that principle of the separation of Church and State which is one of the largest contributions of the New World to civilization and to the church universal." As the historian Bancroft has said, Roger Williams, a Baptist, "was the first person in Christendom to establish civil government on the doctrine of liberty of conscience." In this view Bancroft is followed by practically all accredited historians.

³ See larger edition for a brief statement of the situation, Appendix, Note 24.

⁴ "History of American Christianity," p. 221.

From the foregoing it is easy to surmise that Protestantism has not in all its branches been in accord with full religious liberty and the accompanying necessity of separation of Church and State. In the earliest developments, Lutheranism and the Reformed churches apparently could not conceive of any relation between Church and State except that of union, and they would not allow liberty of conscience. But in this country to-day practically all Protestants would advocate religious liberty and separation of Church and State. From America the influence of this position has gone to establish a measure of religious liberty, if not to disestablish state churches among Protestants and others throughout the world.⁵ American Protestantism has thus presented the world with its finest spiritual treasure, religious liberty.

The spirit of freedom in Protestantism has also manifested itself in Protestant democracy. This has affected the form of government employed by ecclesiastical organizations. The voice of the people is effective in a very large measure in most Protestant denominations. Many have strictly congregational forms of government in which the voice of the people is the final appeal.

⁵ Compare Troeltsch, "Protestantism and Progress."

This is in direct contrast to the Roman hierarchy. It is an absolute monarchy, with the final authority inhering in the pope, from whom it comes down to the humblest subject, from whom is demanded absolute submission. The pope is elected by the college of cardinals, who have previously been appointed by popes. He is in no sense answerable to the people, nor are any of the other members of the hierarchy. The fact that priests are usually recruited from the ranks of the common people does not make the Roman Church a democracy as is sometimes claimed, for they are not elected, selected, or rejected by the people. That some Romanists describe their church as precisely similar to our free, democratic republic would seem impossible. The people can control our country, but in Romanism they have no control or appreciable influence over the hierarchy. This hierarchy could not possibly be farther from a democratic form of government.

Moreover, Rome is not only an ecclesiastical absolute monarchy. It claims also to be a political government, requiring a temporal kingdom,⁶ and also exercising supreme authority over all other political governments. For this latter conception the famous bull of Boniface VIII (Unam Sanctam) is authority: "Therefore, if the earthly power deviates from the way, it shall be judged by the spiritual power; if the inferior spiritual power, by its superior spiritual power. . . Whoever resists this power, thus ordained by God, resists the ordination of God. . . Then, to be subject to the Roman pontiff we declare, say, define, and pronounce to be absolutely necessary to every human creature to salvation." This ancient dogma has been confirmed in modern times by the Syllabus of Errors of Pius IX, which not only condemned religious liberty, but declared the ecclesiastical law to be supreme over civil law. The Romanist ideal is that the pope should control the world through the officials of various states who must be subject to him. Coppens says (p. 106): "The two societies, the Church and the State, can help each other by their corporate action. If their views should differ, the higher and wider society should prevail. Besides, Catholic governors owe deference to the church whose members they are." It is only because the papacy lacks the physical forces and because it cannot successfully appeal to peoples against their respective governments to do the will of the hierarchy, that the papal ideal of spiritual supremacy over the various governments of the world fails of its realization.

⁶ It is claimed that the pope should be a temporal ruler and actual king. The papal states have now been finally taken from him by a united Italy. The pope remains a voluntary prisoner in the Vatican because the Roman Curia holds that he must not come out until his kingdom is restored to him.

Plainly this ideal is significant for understanding the relation of Romanism to political democracy. Inevitably the absolutism of the Romanist hierarchy, just because of its constitution, is antagonistic to the sovereignty of the people and their democratic aspirations in any sphere, though some Romanists who have come under the influence of modern democracy do not seem able to see this.⁷ The success of the Protestant Reformation made possible the struggle for religious liberty, and greatly augmented the already advanced tendency to political liberty and the breaking down of the political supremacy of the papacy. The two-sided struggle has since gone on hand in hand, and with reference to it Rome has ever been against the liberties of the people, as is plainly shown by the papal declarations quoted above, which condemn so completely the principles and rights of freedom. On the other hand, the principles of Protestantism have ever been harmonious with freedom, and it is a notable fact that Protestantism has had considerable to do with the development of modern states.

Just as plain as this situation in regard to political democracy are the respective positions of Protestantism and Romanism toward freedom in two other spheres. One of these is the sphere of the freedom of speech and the press. Already the quotations of papal declarations made above, which are strongly corroborated by the existence of the Index, have shown how completely official Rome is against these two liberties which are twin children and at the same time twin conservers of freedom. Protestant advocates of religious liberty, not to speak of political freedom, have consistently pleaded for these twins, and that is exactly what the logic of the Protestant principles requires just as the essential contentions of Romanism compel opposition to a free press and to free speech.

⁷ For Rome's past attitude to democracy, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 25.

Also in the sphere of learning, research, and education Rome stands in the way of freedom. Biblical scholarship, theological science, and non-theological science in all matters affecting Roman teaching must submit to the teaching office of the church.⁸ The Congregation of the Index is always ready to exercise its function of condemning publications which set forth unwelcome positions, and bishops everywhere have the authority to forbid the reading of anti-Romanist books not important enough to send to the Congregation. It is a strange and striking fact illustrative of Rome's intolerance of free scientific research that from A. D. 1616 onward the writings of Copernicus (and Galileo) were on the Index, "since Copernicus' system of the universe is altogether contradictory to the Sacred Writings and destructive of Catholic truth." The embarrassment which such an attitude brings to an unchangeable church is illustrated in the fact that from the impression of the Index issued in 1835 these prohibitions silently disappeared and have not since been included, very ostensibly because no well-informed person any longer has doubted the truth of the Copernican theory, also espoused by Galileo. The attack made so recently by Pius X upon "Modernism" is a clear indication of where Rome stands as to freedom of research and learning. The contrasted attitude of Protestantism, which has made freedom possible and which has in no small measure cultivated it, needs no elaboration.

⁸ See larger edition, Appendix, Note 20.

The attitude of Rome toward freedom in education is well known. Rome cannot escape the implications as to her lack of interest in educating the common people which lie in the conditions of illiteracy of those countries where her hierarchy has had full sway for a long time. But it is not to this situation chiefly that we now refer, but rather to her attitude toward free education in this country, and especially her hostility to the public school in all its divisions from primary school to university. Coppens says, "It is distinctly taught in the syllabus of Pius IX that Catholics cannot approve of a system of education which is severed from the Catholic faith and from the power of the church, and which regards only or primarily natural knowledge and social life." Thus Romanism is declared to be inherently and inevitably opposed to our free-school system, and it is not surprising that her priests use ecclesiastical pressure to overcome the preference of Romanist parents for the public school which has meant already so much for the liberties and prosperity of our nation. What is surprising is that sensible people should yield their judgment as to the better education for their children and choose to send them elsewhere than to this thoroughly American institution simply because of the decree of an ecclesiastical power, and that too a power whose central location is on foreign territory and whose control is in the hands of men of a foreign nation who cannot possibly sympathize with our institutions, even if they could by diligent inquiry really understand them. This attitude of Romanism has led Romanists to strive to secure from public funds appropriations for their educational institutions, not to mention the situation with reference to other kinds of activity. This effort, which has not only been proposed, but actually carried out in demands for legislative action, as, for example, in Rhode Island, is logical enough for Romanists, but absolutely opposed to the established American principle of separation of Church and State, and consequently reveals how inherently antagonistic Romanism is to American ideals of freedom and democracy. Protestants, though maintaining at their own expense, and in larger and more effective measure than Romanism, their own schools for higher education, stand without exception for the free-school system.

If Protestantism had contributed no more than these various elements of modern freedom which can justly be accredited to it, its superiority to Romanism and its permanent worth to the world would be proved.

Quiz

1. What is the main part of Romanist worship?
2. What are the important elements of Protestant worship?
3. What are the contrasted reasons of Protestants and Romanists for church attendance?
4. What is the explanation of the apparently greater attendance of Romanists upon church services?
5. What is the proper mutual attitude of Protestants and Romanists?
6. What is the official attitude of Romanism toward freedom?
7. To whom is chief credit due in the accomplishment of religious liberty in this country?
8. How has freedom affected respectively the church governments of Protestants and Romanists?
9. What have been the relations of Romanism and of Protestantism to the achievement of political liberty and democracy?
10. What have been the attitudes of Romanism and of Protestantism toward freedom of the press, of speech, and of learning?

Suggestions for Further Study

1. Can Protestants take practically the same attitude toward worship as do Romanists?
2. On what do you depend for spiritual benefit from public worship? 3. The spiritual benefit from public worship which is not possible for those who do not attend church. 4. Romanists who believe in the modern and American ideas of freedom in spite of the teaching of their church. 5. The reason why freedom and what it involves is in greater favor with some Romanists in America than with Roman officialdom and Romanists in other countries. 6. The espousal by individual Romanists even in great number of freedom and certain more liberal attitudes in relation to the official position of the church. 7. Does the service rendered by individuals toward the accomplishment of liberty in this country change the official teaching of Romanism?

Part II

The Present Protestant Situation

CHAPTER X

THE DIVISIONS OF PROTESTANTISM

IT is a most difficult task to set forth adequately the significance of the several Protestant denominations. When members of the same denomination differ among themselves as to the significance of their body, it is inevitable that the statements of an outsider will be liable to the charge of inadequacy, if not of inaccuracy. A brief general statement such as this must leave out many modifying considerations, and so will be open to the charge of incompleteness. Yet it is possible to make a statement with reference to the nature and extent of the divisions of Protestantism which will be sufficiently accurate and adequate for a broad view and for understanding why the divisions exist.

It is primary and fundamental in understanding Protestant denominationalism to recognize that denominational division is not so overwhelmingly significant to Protestants as division must be to Romanism. The breadth of the foundation principles of Protestantism is so great that a single creed or a single ecclesiastical organization is not a necessity. The question, therefore, is not so pressing as that of the factions of Romanism is for Romanists.

But even so, why are there so many divisions of Protestantism? According to the United States Census Report of 1906, there were in this country one hundred and eighty-eight different religious organizations. But the mere statement of this fact does the gravest injustice to the real situation if the implication is drawn from it that each of these different organizations is of entirely separate and antagonistic religious significance. It is also a mistake to suppose that all of these are Protestant bodies.

Among those not Protestant are the several Catholic bodies. The Roman Catholic Church is included in the number mentioned, as are also two comparatively recent schismatic offshoots of Romanism, namely, the Reformed Catholic Church and the Polish National Church. There are also several bodies representing the Oriental Catholic Churches of Russia, Greece, Serbia, Syria, and Armenia. In addition to the Catholic bodies, but far removed from them in significance, are the groups popularly known as Mormons, who can scarcely be regarded as Protestants, and of whom there are two bodies, one of which is by profession at least Christian. Other non-Protestant groups are the Spiritualists and Christian Scientists. Outside of Christianity altogether are the Chinese and Japanese temples, the Jews, the Theosophists, the Bahais, the Vedanta Society, and the Ethical Culturists, all of which groups receive separate count in the census report. Thus the number of organizations referred to must be considerably reduced before the Protestants are reached at all.

A still further reduction is necessary to do justice to the actual significance of Protestantism. Inter-related groups form single families of denominations. These families have internal agreement among their several members in the most essential significance of the group. In each, one or two branches have nearly all the numerical strength, and are surrounded by a number of small bodies that are only faint eddies in the family current which, with other such currents, goes to make up the stream of Protestantism. The family members are sometimes related as parent and offshoot, and sometimes are bound by common principles and practices though springing from different or common parentage. A common name is sometimes evidence of membership in a family, but in certain instances family connection is closer without a common title. For example, there is less difference in essential significance between Disciples of Christ and Baptists than between the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Protestant Church; and the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists, in spite of their name, are more nearly Presbyterian than Methodist and tend to fraternize with Presbyterian bodies. The best basis on which to relate the several denominations is that of historical origin and essential significance. On this basis in some instances relation may be established in more than one direction, but upon it at least a general view of the most significant currents of Protestantism can be secured.

Nearly all of the Protestant denominations can be related directly or indirectly to the three great divisions of the Protestant Reformation movement. Naturally, Lutherans are considered first.

There are in this country twenty-four different Lutheran organizations.¹ All of these, however, have quite the same general Protestant significance, and there is no reason for counting some of the divisions separately in any sense. All agree in the cardinal teaching of justification by faith. The sacraments of the church are channels of grace, but transubstantiation is repudiated. Infant baptism is practised. With reference to the sacraments, Lutherans are nearer to Romanism than other Protestants and, excepting in a measure some less rigid branches, tend more to accord with medieval religion. Indications of the tendency are to be seen in the liturgy and in the observance of church festivals. As to church government, Lutherans in this country have been theoretically congregational, but in the application of the theory

¹ See United States Census Report for 1906, which is the source of the statistics and much other information given. Compare also H. K. Carroll and Chas. S. MacFarland. The membership is given in order to convey in a general way the relative numerical strength of the various denominations. For such a relative showing the census report is the latest and most reliable source, though it is to be remembered that in the last eleven years each of the denominations has grown, yet not so as to affect their mutual relations in any considerable degree. Mention of some of the smaller divisions in the several groups is omitted because they lack any essential significance for our purpose.

they have developed in some of their organizations what is nearly, if not quite, a presbyterian form of government, and in some others have drifted into the recognition practically, if not ecclesiastically, of a bishopric.²

Organized divisions among Lutherans are due to several causes, namely, the difference in church government just referred to; the opposition of conservative and liberal forces; the difference of language and national affiliations due to the various sources of Lutheran immigration to this country; and the sectional questions connected with the Civil War. The General Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in the United States of America (membership 270,221) is the most liberal of all branches, excepting one small body, and most easily fraternizes with other Protestant denominations. It allows ministers of other denominations on occasion to occupy its pulpits and grants members of other denominations the privilege of participation in the Lord's Supper. The General Council of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in North America (membership 462,177) was formed by the withdrawal of large numbers from the General Synod because of the latter's liberality. "Lutheran pulpits are for Lutheran ministers only, and Lutheran altars are for Lutheran communicants only, and exceptions to the rule belong to the sphere of privilege not of right" was the final position of the General

² See H. K. Carroll, pp. 48f.

Council, which also took an attitude strongly opposed to secret societies. This body is less Anglicized than the General Synod and less German than the Evangelical Lutheran Synodical Conference (membership 648,529), which is the most conservative and adheres most rigidly to the historic Lutheran confessions of faith. These three include two-thirds of the Lutherans in this country. The other third is scattered among a number of smaller bodies, a few of which have considerable numerical strength, and these maintain separate organizations chiefly on national and geographical grounds.³

Besides the bodies which bear the name of Luther, there are three others directly connected with Lutherans: the German Evangelical Synod of North America (membership 293,197), which represents the state church resulting from a union of Lutheran and German Reformed churches in Prussia; and two small bodies representing a revival movement in Sweden, where the state church is Lutheran, the Swedish Evangelical Mission Covenant (membership 20,760) and the Swedish Evangelical Free Mission (membership 6,952).⁴

The Reformed movement, the second great stream of the Reformation, is represented in this country most directly by four bodies whose names include the word "Reformed" and by the Presbyterians.

³ See United States Census Report.

⁴ According to the above grouping, including unmentioned smaller bodies, the Lutheran family had a membership in 1906 of 2,359,277.

All of these are Calvinistic in theology, and give the characteristic emphasis of that system to the doctrines of the sovereignty of God and his decrees concerning the salvation of men. All likewise have practically the same presbyterian form of church government.

The [Dutch] Reformed Church in America (membership 124,938) represents the Reformed Church of Holland, adheres to the Heidelberg Catechism, and is composed chiefly of the Dutch and their descendants. The [German] Reformed Church in the United States (membership 292,654) uses the same catechism and has the same form of government, but is composed of Germans and their descendants. The Christian Reformed Church (membership 26,669) represents a body of the same name in Holland and holds a modified form of Calvinism. The Hungarian Reformed Church (membership 5,253) is like the others except in point of nationality, and in that it is connected officially with the national church of Hungary.

The Presbyterians are the most numerous and perhaps the most influential representatives in this country of the Reformed movement. They came hither originally from Scotland, England, and Ireland. There are twelve divisions. The chief strength is in one body, the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America (membership 1,179,566), which, like all other Presbyterian groups, holds to the Westminster Confession and the presbyterian form of church government. The Cumberland Presbyterians (membership 195,770) came into separate existence in the early part of the last century, after a great religious revival in Tennessee and Kentucky, as the result of a controversy concerning the licensing of preachers to take care of the new converts, though these preachers had not been as fully educated as the high standards of Presbyterians required. The Presbyterian Church in the United States (membership 266,345) is the conservative Southern body which separated on account of the Civil War. It includes most of the Presbyterians who live in the South, though the Northern Presbyterians have some churches there, especially among the Negroes. The Welsh Calvinistic Methodists (membership 13,280) originated from the work in Wales of Wesley and Whitefield, the latter of whom was a Calvinist, and are really presbyterian in belief and church government. The United Presbyterians (membership 130,342) differ from the others chiefly in their opposition to secret societies, in forbidding the privilege of communion to those who do not agree with their church's position, and in insisting that only psalms, and no hymns written by uninspired writers, shall be sung in the church services. Four distinct, but very small bodies of Reformed Presbyterians (aggregate membership 10,199) agree with other Presbyterians as to the Westminster Confession and the form of church government, with the United Presbyterians in their opposition to secret societies and the use of hymns, and with one another as to the unrighteousness of instrumental music in the church and as to opposition to any political government which does not recognize Christ as head; and they differ among themselves as to the practical measures to take in securing the recognition of Christ by the government, some of them refusing to vote. All Presbyterians baptize infants and use affusion or sprinkling as the mode. They have always laid a strong emphasis on doctrinal matters, yet among them to-day are some of the strongest advocates of cooperation among various Protestant bodies.

Still another representative of the Reformed movement is the Congregational denomination (membership 700,480). Toward the end of the sixteenth century a small body of Calvinists in England became an independent church, emphasizing in contrast to the Anglican Church, from which it broke away, the principle of democratic church government which had been advocated by the Anabaptists. This body had to flee to Holland, and thence came to this country as the Pilgrims in 1620. Later, when the Puritans or extreme Calvinist party in the Church of England failed to overturn the Anglican polity and were forced out of the church, some were absorbed by various independent churches in England, and some came to this country. In New England the Puritans and Pilgrims established the church which has become the Congregational denomination. The relations between this body and the Presbyterians have been fairly close, and at one time in the early part of the last century there was a working agreement as to territorial division. The Congregationalists have been especially responsive to modern liberal Protestant conceptions, and have largely ceased to be the exponents of any theological system such as Calvinism. Sprinkling and infant baptism are practised. The one preeminently distinguishing mark of the body is its form of church government according to which the local church is free to act in all its concerns without interference from ecclesiastical authority.⁵ Associations and councils are advisory only.

The Anglican Church was connected historically with the Calvinistic movement, yet finally remained distinct from it.⁶ Its counterpart in this country is the Protestant Episcopal Church (membership 886,942), whose emphasis upon medieval ecclesiastical piety is greater than that of any other body affected by the Reformed movement, and whose church government is more exclusive and medieval than even that of the Lutherans. While this body includes some of the most liberal theological scholars, the canons of the church are very exclusive, ecclesiastically speaking, and the High Church Party seeks to dominate the church with the strictest sacramentarian medievalism. The Episcopal Church is undoubtedly among Protestants the church of reverence for historical continuity in religious practices, of ecclesiasticism in religion, and of ritualism in worship. Like the medieval church, it has three orders of ministers—deacons, priests, and bishops. It claims historical apostolic succession, which it admits is also possessed by the Roman and Oriental Catholic Churches, but by no others. No ministers are really such unless ordained by a bishop in this succession, so that no minister of any other communion is allowed to speak in an Episcopalian pulpit without special permission from the bishop of the diocese in which the pulpit is located. Even this permission has been canonically legal only in recent years. A quite famous Baptist minister was recently refused permission to address from an Episcopalian pulpit a meeting to be held in the interest of church union, because he did not believe in infant baptism, and another meeting-place had to be secured which was under less restricted ecclesiastical affiliations.⁷

⁵ In view of the present emphasis of the Congregationalists, and since they have ceased to be distinctly Calvinistic, it might be logical to classify them with the Anabaptist group. If they are retained, the whole number of members in the Reformed family is 2,976,753.

⁶ See larger edition, Part I, Chap. III.

In grouping the modern representatives of the Anabaptist movement and its pre-Reformation forerunners, three distinct kinds of connection are to be pointed out. Several bodies may be traced by direct historical continuity to the Anabaptists. Others have sprung directly or indirectly from these descendent groups. Still others have had an independent origin, but are to be connected here because they emphasize some one or more of the Anabaptist tenets.

⁷ In 1873 the Protestant Episcopal Church split over the question of communing with members of other denominations, and the seceding body is known as the Reformed Episcopal Church (membership 9,683), and has espoused the more evangelical positions of Protestants.

The two oldest of the denominations in this family, in our country, are the Moravian Brethren (membership 17,155) and the Evangelical Union of Bohemian and Moravian Brethren (membership 771), whose history in both cases can be traced back five hundred years to the influence of John Hus, the Bohemian martyr. Their beliefs and practices before the Reformation were distinctly Anabaptist.⁸ To-day they have principles somewhat like those of the Mennonites and modern Baptists, but practices more like those of other denominations. The Moravians are noted for their missionary activities.

A second group to be traced directly to the Anabaptists are the Mennonites. After the fierce persecutions of the Anabaptists of Holland and adjacent regions had begun to abate, Menno Simon, an Anabaptist leader, traveled from place to place, greatly heartening the scattered members of the despised sect. The denomination which was thus solidified took its name from his, and holds practically all of the tenets which were supported by the bulk of the Anabaptists. The Mennonites do not baptize infants. They use affusion or sprinkling as the mode of baptism, though some branches in this country employ immersion. There are two chief and twelve smaller organizations of them. The membership (aggregate 54,798) is composed chiefly of immigrants, descendants of immigrants, and converts made especially among German-speaking people. The separate existence of the several divisions is due in part to differences of nationality, but more especially to the relative rigidity employed in the respective bodies in executing church discipline with reference to various matters.

⁸ See A. H. Newman, "A History of Anti-Pedobaptism," pp. 49-54.

By far the most numerous, influential, and important group which can be traced directly to the Anabaptists is that of the modern Baptists. They arose in England probably through the activities of Anabaptist missionaries who were refugees from continental persecutions. The first known advocate of Anabaptist principles in America was Roger Williams, who came to this land as a clergyman of the Church of England, but whose advocacy of Anabaptist principles led to his banishment from Massachusetts and his founding of Rhode Island, the first organized government known to man to be established on the foundation of religious liberty. Others of similar beliefs came from abroad, and some in the various colonies in this country were convinced of the validity of the Anabaptist contentions. Thus the Baptists grew slowly. But during the last century they increased three times as fast as the population and came to be one of the numerically great denominations.

The chief emphasis of the Baptists has been double. It has been put upon loyalty to the Scripture and upon the necessity of carrying the fundamental position of Protestantism toward faith to an application beyond that of other denominations. This application has concerned church government, the relation of the Church and State, and the ceremonies of the church. Since individual faith is the determining element of religious life, every individual Christian is of such worth that he deserves a voice and vote in the administering of the local church. Also the conscience must be free from interference either by ecclesiastical authority of bishop or legislative council or by civil authority. Consequently each local church is free of outside control and the Church and State must be separate. Similarly, the Baptist contention in regard to infant baptism and immersion⁹ and their view of the Lord's Supper¹⁰ emphasize the central place of faith. At the same time Baptists hold that the New Testament teaching and practice bear out their positions.

Most Baptists in this country and Canada hold to what is called "restricted" communion; not, however, on the basis of some bodies who believe that they have the one and only way to God, but simply because Baptists think that baptism should precede participation in the Lord's Supper—so far all Christians agree—and since the immersion of believers is the only proper Christian baptism, persons not thus baptized should not partake of the Lord's Supper. But both in this country and in other lands there are many Baptist individuals and Baptist churches which do not thus hold. Adherence to "restricted" communion is not universally made a test of denominational fellowship. There is a noticeable tendency in this country, especially among the Baptists of the Northern half, away from the "restricted" view. There are also a few Baptist churches in this country which have in their membership a few unimmersed persons received by letter from churches of other denominations.

⁹ See above, pp. 43-47.

¹⁰ See above, pp. 56f.

There are several bodies of Baptists, of which by far the most numerous are the Regular Baptists (membership 5,323,183) so called to distinguish them from other groups. The classification by H. K. Carroll, and to a less degree, the United States Census, implies that the Regular Baptists are subdivided into several distinct bodies. The white churches are organized for united efforts in two conventions, the Southern Baptist Convention and the Northern Baptist Convention, and the Negro Baptists have several organizations. But these organizations are separated only for purposes of efficiency and not because they are in any sense separate denominations. Before the formation of the Northern Baptist Convention the united endeavors of the constituent churches were carried on by numerous Societies, one of which, the Publication Society, served churches both North and South, and all of which are now in affiliation with the Northern Baptist Convention. There is to-day no such division between the Baptists of the North and South as exists between the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church South, which have rival churches in the same communities. There is not even a clear mark of distinction between white and colored Baptists, for there are many Negro members of white Baptist churches, and there are churches composed entirely of Negroes which are affiliated with district associations composed almost entirely of white churches. Such Negroes are counted in the statistics of the Northern Convention. At the same time some of these same Negro churches are also connected with the general national organizations whose members are exclusively Negroes. It is plain, therefore, that the Regular Baptists are a single denomination, though they are variously and perhaps, to an outsider, confusedly organized. Baptists themselves think only of the unity of all Baptists, North, South, white, and colored.

There are several smaller distinct bodies of Baptists. Free Baptists now are as completely amalgamated with Regular Baptists as any two such democratic bodies can be. The Free Baptists (membership 81,359) should therefore really be counted with Regular Baptists, through whose agencies they now carry on their chief denominational work. They send representatives to the Northern Baptist Convention and other Regular Baptist organizations. Quite distinct are the "Primitive," or "Old-school," or "Antimissionary" Baptists, sometimes nicknamed "Hard-shell" Baptists (membership 102,311). They are rigidly and extremely Calvinistic in theology, and are opposed to Sunday Schools and missionary and Bible societies. They are found chiefly in the South, where they have a considerable measure of success. The remaining seven small bodies aggregate about the same numbers as the Antimissionary Baptists. It is plain therefore that about ninety-seven per cent of the Baptists are Regular.

The Moravians, Mennonites, and Baptists are direct descendants of the Anabaptists. Outside of these are certain bodies which stand for almost the same thing as Baptists. Quite markedly related to Baptists are those people who forwarded during the nineteenth century several movements for church union by urging a return to the New Testament standard of church life. The body known as Disciples of Christ (membership 982,701) resulted from a movement led by Thomas and Alexander Campbell. These men had been Presbyterian, became Baptist, and then later drew a number of Baptist churches, on the basis of church union and the legal necessity of baptism for the remission of sins, into a new denomination which, however, refuses to regard itself as a denomination. A similar movement had started in another part of the country partly under Baptist leadership, and these people called their churches "Christian." Some of these churches joined in with the Disciples' movement, but those not so joining are known as the Christian Connection (membership 110,117). The titles used by these churches are further confused by the fact that some churches originally wholly identified with the Disciples' movement, but which now are not so closely allied, call themselves the Churches of Christ (membership 159,658). They are opposed to missionary and publication organizations of the Disciples. The Churches of God in North America (membership 24,356) originated with the German Reformed people of Maryland, but stand for practically the same positions as Disciples, except that they have a presbyterian form of government. All of these groups are very similar to the Baptists, except that they make a special point of church union on their peculiar platform. Disciples have sometimes been called "Campbel-lite" Baptists.

Almost as close to the Baptists as Disciples are the Adventists. In the Reformation period not a few Anabaptists believed in the immediate or early coming of Christ and wandered about amid the possible vagaries connected with speculation upon this subject. The Adventists sprang up under Baptist leadership, and have taken a considerable part of their numerical strength from Baptist churches. The group arose in this country with the Millerite movement of the early part of the last century. The failure of Christ to appear at the times predicted has not prevented the continued existence of the Adventist groups, which may fairly be regarded as Baptist with a millenarian emphasis. There are several bodies, all of which immerse and refuse to baptize infants. The two chief divisions are the Seventh Day Adventists (membership 62,211) and the Advent Christians (membership 26,799). The former of these legalistically insists on the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, and practises foot-washing in connection with the Lord's Supper, while the latter believes in conditional immortality. There are also four extremely small bodies which give especial emphasis to a number of different elements of the Old Testament religion.¹¹

The third class of denominations belonging in a sense to the Anabaptist stream are neither directly descended from the Anabaptists of the Reformation period nor from any of the direct descendants. But they have all espoused some one or more of the Anabaptist practices or teachings.

The "Dunkers," or "Dunkards," or "German

¹¹ The numerical strength of the Baptistic group is great: direct descendants, 5,676,106; related to Baptists, Disciples, and allies, 1,276,832; and Adventists, 92,735; total, 7,048,673.

Baptist Brethren," are an example of the third type. Originating among Lutherans as a result of the pietistic movement in the German churches, which came about as a protest against the dead spirit of Protestant orthodoxy in Germany in the seventeenth century, the denomination developed its doctrinal conceptions, its church polity, and its practices along Anabaptist lines similar to those of the Mennonites, Quakers, and other "plain peoples." They have no written creeds, but hold to the Scriptures as sufficient. They baptize by trine immersion; that is, they submerge three times in succession after the manner of the Oriental Catholic Church; they practise foot-washing; and they refuse to baptize infants. Great emphasis is laid upon unworldliness; and plain dressing of a set fashion without further adornment is insisted on. Women are expected to wear a prayer-covering, or veil, during prayer. The form of church government is similar to the Presbyterian, but ministers do not for the most part receive any salaries. These people came at an early date to our country, but have kept themselves socially isolated, and have largely retained their original customs and spirit. They are almost entirely of German extraction. There are four divisions, the main one of which includes nearly four-fifths of all Dunkers. The entire group (membership 97,144) is more like the modern Mennonites than the modern Baptists and, like the former, has its spirit from European sources.

Another body of Christians arising after the Reformation and espousing Anabaptist positions is that of the Friends, commonly known as Quakers. They sprang up in England from much the same soil as the Baptists. The quaint costume which became the badge of Quakers was borrowed from the Baptists of the seventeenth century. The Quakers took up the Anabaptist principle of the "inner light," or the direct guidance of the Holy Spirit of God as the supreme authority for each Christian life. So far did they carry the emphasis of the internal side of Christian life that they denied the necessity or the usefulness of the church ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper. Two other Anabaptist principles taken up by the Quakers were the refusal to take oaths and to hold public office and the refusal to fight, with the consequent emphasis upon peace. From the Orthodox body (membership 91,161) have separated two groups, the Hicksite Friends (membership 18,560), who are Unitarian in doctrine, and the Wilburite Friends (membership 3,380), who insist on "the waiting worship" being maintained.

Somewhat later than the origin of the Quakers the Wesleyan movement arose in England. The religious life of England had settled down into a dead formalism. John Wesley, a minister of the Church of England, began even in his university days an attempt at the revival of real piety and spirituality in that church. He was forced out of the church, and as a result we have the bodies which are Wesleyan, or Methodist. The name "Methodist" arose as a nickname of reproach. Methodists early came to this country, where they have had a remarkable growth. The Methodists are Arminian in theology, which means that they have always emphasized the part which man through his will plays in his own religious life more than the part of God, which is the point of especial emphasis in Calvinism. The Methodist type of religious thinking has greatly affected most evangelical Protestant bodies in this country.

The Methodists have emphasized, perhaps as no other body except the Baptists, the necessity of a really converted church-membership, though they have not agreed with Baptists in making the rejection of infant baptism and the insistence on immersion a means of urging this necessity. Most Methodists practise infant baptism and usually sprinkling, but some use immersion, and all groups, at least theoretically, permit it. The Lord's Supper is observed as a memorial meal with spiritual, but not strictly speaking sacramental blessing, though the name "sacrament" is used. The relation to Anabaptists is far less direct than that of the other groups thus far mentioned, but is nevertheless distinct. Wesley himself came directly under the influence of the Moravian teaching and spirit, and his subsequent teaching and religious life showed the influence of the contact. If this contact did not originate, it at least greatly increased, the emphasis of Methodists on the Anabaptist and pre-Reformation idea of the "inner light." This undoubtedly affected the characteristically Methodist doctrine of "sanctification," according to which it is possible through the presence of the Holy Spirit to attain to "a freedom from sin, from evil desires and tempers, and from pride." The Methodist bodies have perhaps more than other Protestants undertaken formally to keep the people to a stricter conformity in avoidance of certain amusements and so-called worldly things, but recently there has been a tendency to greater leniency in the application of church discipline in such matters. The government of the church has been chiefly in the hands of the ministers except in groups like the Methodist Protestants. To meet the criticism of this situation, the laity, in recent years, have been given a somewhat larger place than before in the general church organizations of the largest body of Methodists. The ministry has but two orders, deacons and elders, though the name "bishop" is used for the office of the general superintendent, who is, nevertheless, of the same ministerial order as all other elders.

The Methodist Episcopal Church (membership 2,986,154) has its local churches chiefly, though not entirely, in the Northern States and quite wholly among white people. Early in the last century the Negro folk felt they were not being treated justly, and withdrew from the main body. Four distinct bodies have resulted.¹² The Methodist Protestant Church (membership 178,544) agrees in doctrine with the main body, but has no bishops and gives laymen equal representation with the ministers in the conferences. The Methodist Episcopal Church South (membership 1,638,480) broke from the main body over the questions involved in the Civil War. Its positions now are practically those of the main body, but it has some differences in lay representation in government. It maintains its churches even in the same community with churches of the main body. The Free Methodists (membership 32,838) came into being to protest against membership in secret societies, pew-rents, and the abuse of executive power and ecclesiastical authority. This body is like other Methodists, except that it emphasizes entire sanctification and insists on a most rigid application of church discipline and a most rigorous view of the hereafter.¹³ The separating differences of the several divisions of Methodists have not been doctrinal as a rule, but have had to do with church government and discipline.

Closely connected with the Methodists in origin

¹² These are the Union American Methodist Episcopal Church (membership 4,347), the African Methodist Episcopal Church (membership 494,777), the African Union Methodist Protestant Church (membership 5,592), and the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church (membership 184,542). An additional division in the South, which came about by mutual agreement, produced the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church (membership 172,996).

¹³ There are several small additional Methodist bodies, some white and some colored, some with the name Methodist, and some with other titles, as for example the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene.

and significance are the United Brethren in Christ. The influence of the Methodist movement in the eighteenth century, of German pietism upon German-speaking congregations in this country, and of the Mennonites who contributed some ministers and people, resulted in the formation of this denomination. It is altogether probable that the body would have united with the Methodist Episcopal Church more than a century ago if at that time that church had encouraged the use of German in the church services of this group. The doctrinal positions are almost identical with those of Methodists, and the form of church government is practically the same. There are two bodies, of which the larger is now known as the United Brethren in Christ (membership 274,659), and the more conservative seceding group (membership 21,401) as the Church of the United Brethren in Christ (Old Constitution).

The Evangelical Association (membership 104,898) was also the result of work done in the Methodist spirit followed by the refusal of the Methodist Episcopal Church to minister in German to the German people of Pennsylvania. This body is quite Methodist in belief and practice. Likewise is the United Evangelical Church (membership 69,882) which also makes a point of emphasizing the fellowship of all Christians.

From the Methodists in England sprang the Salvation Army (membership in this country 22,908), which has become such an evangelistic and philanthropic force in so many places. The general theological opinions underlying the work of the Army are in general very similar to those of the Methodists. Two smaller similar bodies are the American Salvation Army (membership 436) and the Volunteers of America (membership 2,194). The Volunteers and the Salvation Army do not expect their converts to remain with them, but rather encourage their joining some church, though the Volunteers, more than the Army, insist on this policy.

Methodists¹⁴ have had a great influence upon modern Protestantism. The Methodist and Baptist families have been the dominant representatives of that type of religious thought and life which in the time of the Reformation was seeking expression in manifold variations through the Anabaptists. The Baptists have run truer to type, but both families have found their followers chiefly among the masses of the people.

Outside of the representatives of the three great channels of the Reformation and subsequent Protestant growth there are some lesser currents. One of these is the tendency to rationalism. Ever since the New Testament days themselves attempts have been made to square the conceptions concerning Christ and his person to the philosophies prevail-

¹⁴ The Methodist family, including those bodies springing from Methodists, but not bearing the name or being identical with them, numbers in all 6,244,209. This number and those of the Dunkards, Quakers, and the Baptist family (7,048,673) make a total of 13,693,372 for the Anabaptist group, and with Congregationalists, 14,393,862.

ing at any given time. One result has been the Unitarian interpretation of Christ. Though in the fourth century the Council of Nice declared against the teachings of Arius, a Unitarian, and though the church seemed to settle down to this decision, nevertheless advocates of Unitarian doctrine arose from time to time. In the Reformation period rationalistic Humanism created some Unitarian groups which influenced a few of the Anabaptists. Other advocates have continued to set forth their Unitarian contentions since the Reformation. In our country advocates of a Unitarian conception of God and Christ separated about a century ago chiefly from the Congregational churches of New England. The resulting Unitarian denomination (membership 70,542) has no creed, and refuses no one church fellowship on doctrinal grounds. It adheres to the congregational form of church government. Unitarianism has undoubtedly affected the religious thinking of the last century.¹⁵

The Universalists (membership 64,158) emphasize chiefly the doctrine that ultimately in the hereafter God will save all, after men have suffered retribution for sin. But they are chiefly Unitarian in doctrine also, though many among them hold Trinitarian views.

Another tendency marking the Christian centuries is seen in the formation of small groups to restore the simplicity of New Testament Christianity. It found repeated expression before the Reformation, and has since issued in a number of bodies. In this country, where no ecclesiastical power can coerce, these sporadic attempts at setting up New Testament conditions have had full sway and have been too numerous to detail. The existence of these numerous small groups without strength or influence leads some to think that Protestantism tends to break up into many divisions. They are really only slight eddies thrown off from the great currents of Protestantism and are similar to the small groups which have always from time to time sprung up during the Christian centuries.

¹⁵ The rationalizing tendency has found expression among the German people in the German Evangelical Protestant Ministers' Association (membership 23,518) and the German Evangelical Ministers' Conference (membership 11,186). The former especially is Unitarian.

The followers of Swedenborg, the Scandinavian mystic and mathematician, are organized in two bodies, the General Convention of the New Jerusalem in the United States of America (membership 6,612) and the General Church of the New Jerusalem (membership 635). The small number is a fair measure of the influence Swedenborg has had in Protestantism after a century or more of the propagation of his teachings.

In addition to any special denominational groups of churches there are, according to the census of 1906, 1,065 independent church organizations, with an aggregate membership of 73,673. Some are Baptist, some Congregational, some Lutheran, some Methodist, some Presbyterian, some Reformed, and some others have various denominational names, but none of these are affiliated with any denomination. They are unrelated among themselves, and have no significance for the full sweep of the Protestant movement.

To summarize, it is clear that the large number of separate ecclesiastical names of various groups which are used in statistical tables are not really indicative of nearly so many significant divisions of Protestants. The different denominations fall into the three groups of the Reformation time. The Lutheran family is fairly unified in significance, and its smaller bodies are hardly to be regarded as rivals of the two main bodies which have the chief strength. The same may be said of the Presbyterians, who are the chief representatives of the Reformed movement and who have been closely associated with the Congregationalists, the second in importance among Reformed bodies. The Episcopalians have been influenced by the Reformed movement and connected with it, but should probably be regarded as distinct and outside this group. The third division, the Anabaptist, is the largest. The Moravian and Bohemian Brethren, the Mennonites and their satellites trace their history far back and maintain old and partially national traditions, but do not possess much significance as rivals of the larger denominations. The Baptists of various kinds, with the denominations which have been historically associated with them, such as the Disciples, Adventists, and Dunkers, form a very large and influential group who have played a large part in the molding of the religious life of this country. Among the members of this group there is a great deal of mutual respect and sympathy, and even some cooperation. The Quakers are quite distinct, carrying to a most radical issue some of the Anabaptist principles. The Methodists, with the strong denominations growing out of their influence, are essentially one family. Outside the three streams of the Reformation developments are the smaller groups showing the rationalizing tendency, the very small and numerous bodies attempting in a more or less uninformed and fanatical way a restoration of New Testament conditions, and the quite large number of independent churches. It is plain, therefore, that instead of one hundred and fifty different denominations in this country, each with its separate way to God, there are really less than ten important divisions with distinctive and numerical significance, and even these are closely related in three or four streams determined by the course of development at the time of the Reformation.

The charge of sectarianism and consequent instability made against Protestantism is often, if not always, based on the supposition that the cause of division is creedal and due to the absence of an absolute teaching authority. Intellectual or creedal differences have figured, but it is not chiefly these which have made the greatest number of divisions among Protestants in this country or which keep denominations apart. Far more frequent and powerful have been the differences as to church government. This is not the trivial matter which some affect to believe it. The world is still engaged in the great struggle to escape political autocracy and to establish democratic forms of government. This same struggle proceeds in the sphere of religious institutions and is not unimportant. In the struggle many undoubtedly trivial matters have received too great emphasis, but time alone will tell as to what is important and what unimportant to establish democracy in church government.

Also, national affiliations of various immigrant groups and their descendants rather than differences of theological creeds have operated to perpetuate separate religious bodies even within the same denominational family. The immigrants naturally foster the types of Christianity to which they have been accustomed and which are associated with natural feelings for the fatherland. Germans and Scandinavians especially have been tenacious of national language and traditions. The racial associations of Negroes and the prejudices against them explain still further various separate bodies. It is altogether likely that differences arising from European distinctions will tend to disappear as the people maintaining them become more completely absorbed into the American people.

Other non-intellectual influences which explain especially the divisions of some of the smaller bodies, are the power of a strong personality possessed with the importance of some idea or contention, and the raising of some moral question like slavery or of some disciplinary question like wearing jewelry or belonging to a secret society. It will take time for the sentiments aroused by these influences so to fall away that they will cease to be, in a small way, a part of the dividing forces of Protestants.

Whether it is possible to overcome these causes of division and in what measure already Protestant bodies have been brought to cooperate will be shown in the next chapter.

Quiz

1. Is the existence of divisions among Protestants of fatal significance? 2. Is the number of divisions overwhelmingly great? 3. Can Protestants be grouped into a few significant families? 4. What is the best basis of grouping? 5. What is the significance of the Lutheran family, and what are the chief divisions? 6. What is the chief reason for the divisions of Lutherans in this country? 7. What denominations represent the Reformed churches, and what are their significance? 8. How are Episcopalians to be classified? 9. In the Anabaptist group, which are the direct descendants?

10. How are Disciples and Adventists to be classified? 11. Of the related bodies, which are the most important? 12. Which two denominations in the entire Anabaptist group are the most numerous and influential? 13. What is the significance of the Anabaptist group and the main divisions? 14. What are some of the well-known smaller groups? 15. How many significant divisions of Protestantism are there in this country? 16. What are the causes of division?

Suggestions for Further Study

1. The reason why your denomination is separate from others. 2. Its group classification. 3. Which of the three Protestant streams is the strongest numerically? 4. The basis of choice of membership in any denomination.

CHAPTER XI

THE UNITY OF PROTESTANTISM

IN such an upheaval as the Reformation unanimity was naturally lacking. Just as naturally differences continued and also developed. When some leader or some group found what they regarded as a new view of truth, forthwith, without looking the field over to find whether this particular view was already advocated, a new group was formed. What could have been more natural than that immigrants to this country should join with their respective fellow countrymen in religious activities and that thus nationalistic associations should become so fixed and dear that they would stand in the way of merging organizations? Disparateness among Christians has existed throughout the centuries in some degree and in all branches of the church, Oriental, Roman, and Protestant. It is the disparateness which is inevitable in the development of life. Life has always been manifold and must be so in religion. As a tree unfolds into its branches and leaves, so has Christianity into various bodies of Christians. Protestantism is distinct from other branches of the church in that its essential spirit has not been to prevent entirely this disparateness, but rather to encourage the fullest and most manifold development of life, holding only to those restrictions placed by Christ himself and by the Scripture. It has profited in that the world has secured through one stream of Protestantism, since the Reformation, its greatest spiritual treasure—religious liberty. The disparateness of Protestantism is, therefore, in line with its essential spirit and great contribution, and is not without value. Its very naturalness helps us to understand it, and its connection with freedom may help us to value it.

184

This conclusion proves even more satisfactory as one comes to realize that this disparateness is not necessarily incompatible with a real unity, a unity that means effective cooperation. In spite of the apparent mutuality of antagonisms among Protestants, the consciousness of oneness when relations to Romanism are considered has almost always been strong. More than that, for a long time the consciousness of unity has been gaining headway. For a hundred years in this country there have been movements and agitations for union. These movements have not succeeded, but nevertheless the cause of unity has made progress. The old-time bitterness of denominational controversy is largely passed. A spirit of comity is possessed by some people in practically all of the denominations. Various lines of activity which are to be described in a moment are further evidence of this growing consciousness. A number of proposals for unifying different sections of the same general groups of Christians have been made, and some have been adopted. The merging of the Baptists and Free Baptists, now quite an accomplished fact, is an example. Still more ambitious projects have been launched looking to the uniting of all Protestants. Consequently, it may be said that one of the chief characteristics of Protestantism to-day is this growing sense of oneness and the practical manifestation of the same in actual cooperation.

From the developments thus far several things seem clear. One is that no existing body of Christians can absorb all the rest, and no new body can be formed with a platform of beliefs and ecclesiastical practices acceptable to all Protestants. Religious conceptions weighted with associations of a historic group, and specific ecclesiastical practices sanctified by long usage, are so deep-seated among various divisions of Christians that it is hopeless to try to get Protestants to do to-day what has never for any length of time or over any wide extent of the world been done by Christians during the entire history of Christianity.¹ The temperamental differences of people alone are strong enough to-day as they have always been to make divisions in the church. Absolute uniformity is impossible, and, if achieved, would soon be broken up again. It is quite useless, therefore, to expect an organic union of all Christians which involves entire elimination of differences.

¹ Undoubtedly the World Conference on Faith and Order, in which many denominations are now participating, will do good by revealing the fundamental conceptions which great groups conscientiously hold to be worthful. But this Conference will hardly find a platform upon which all will be willing to stand.

Quite another conclusion has been reached by actual experience in attempting union of religious bodies. It is certain that unless various organizations which possess in the aggregate huge trust funds are ready to jeopardize their possessions by merging different religious corporations, organic union is out of the question. For example, when the Baptists a few years ago were in the process of organizing the Northern Baptist Convention, and the question arose of merging some of the different denominational Societies, it was found impossible to arrange such mergers because of the jeopardizing of funds. If this is the situation in regard to the uniting of organizations within the same denomination, how much more difficult will be the attempt to overcome the legal obstacles to the organic union of two distinct denominations. It is wholly improbable that the various religious bodies of this country will ever run the risk of alienating the vast endowments for educational, philanthropic, missionary, and other purposes in order to have one single ecclesiastical organization which will absorb all others.

Perhaps the various bodies would be willing to give up these endowments if a sufficiently great advantage was to be gained by the formation of a single organization of Christians. But quite aside from the difficulties of such mergers, there is some positive benefit in denominationalism. For one thing, the internal disparateness of Protestantism is both a symbol and a bulwark of religious liberty. Without liberty the various denominations could never have lived. Without denominations, it is at least conceivable that liberty might disappear, for it was achieved in part by denominational struggle. Moreover, the varied emphasis of the several Protestant divisions keeps alive an adequate appreciation of the many-sidedness of Christian truth and prevents any of the important aspects of Christian teaching from falling into obscurity. It was precisely in that period of the history of Christianity when one great section of the church had made the nearest approach to the uniformity which many seem to desire, that the most precious conceptions of the New Testament were entirely obscured and overlaid with ideas quite out of harmony with scriptural Christianity. It took the revolution of the Reformation and all of the subsequent development to win back those spiritual treasures. Can we be so sure that these various aspects which need to be emphasized as long as the world lasts are so firmly held that they have no need of the propagating agencies which rescued them from oblivion and reestablished them in Christendom? We may rather conclude that the development of Protestantism and of the movement toward unity makes clear that denominationalism has its value for maintaining religious liberty and the fulness of Christian teaching.

We might add that the friendly rivalry among various groups is also capable of yielding real worth.

To what then may we hope the growing consciousness of unity will lead? It has already led to the conviction that it is possible for the widest divergence of theological opinions and even of ecclesiastical practices to obtain along with a thorough sense of the essential oneness of Protestantism. For any further development of unity this conviction is absolutely essential and primary. Various Protestant organizations have found that cooperation in practical activities is possible on the basis of the validity of this conviction. In this discovery Protestantism has entered a new road, the road that leads to efficient unity of action with the greatest freedom of belief and ecclesiastical practice. Cooperation in common tasks with utter freedom in personal and denominational convictions is the key which unlocks the door to effectual Protestant unity.

Actual realizations of working unity have proceeded either consciously or unconsciously upon the basis of this conviction. These are, broadly speaking, of two kinds. The one consists of activities either among local churches, among denominational organizations, or among individual members of various denominations which have grown up to meet definite practical problems, but which have not been concerned, primarily at least, with promoting unity as such. The other kind consists of the activities of organizations whose purpose is to promote unity and to amalgamate the activities of separate groups. Thus distinguished, these two kinds of cooperation have been mutually helpful to each other. A brief description of them in the various distinct and mutual aspects will go far to show that Protestantism has already achieved a considerable degree of practical unity, and is fast making progress to a complete cooperation in practical affairs.

Education is a sphere in which denominations have long cooperated. The International Sunday School Association has been a potent force in building up the Sunday School as the educational arm of the church. In prosecuting its primary work it has incidentally given impetus to the growth of unity. The American Sunday School Union has also labored in this sphere. With a somewhat different purpose the Sunday School Council of the Evangelical Denominations works in the educational field. Related in a general way to these organizations are the interdenominational movements of adult classes and brotherhoods. The interdenominational activities of the Christian Endeavor Society are too familiar to need description. Older and just as well known are the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. A newer organization, the Religious Education Association,² is trying to do for religious education what the National Education Society is doing for secular education. The mere mention of these different bodies indicates somewhat the wide extent of the cooperation of Protestantism in the field of religious education.

² This organization is composed of individuals as such rather than of representatives of churches, and is not, strictly speaking, solely Protestant, though consisting chiefly of Protestant educational leaders.

Another sphere in which cooperation has been in a large measure achieved is that of missionary endeavors.

In the field of home missions, that is, missions in our own country, there are two unifying organizations. The Home Missions Council represents the general organizations of the various constituent denominations, while the Council of Women for Home Missions is the interdenominational organization of the women's societies of the several groups. A description of one will be sufficient. The annual report of the Home Missions Council for 1915 gives the constituency as thirty-four denominational societies, representing thirteen different denominations. The Council meets at least once annually, and considers the problems which are common to home mission work in all bodies. One practical achievement illustrates the nature of the work and is of special interest here. A study of a certain Western State revealed that only 11.2 per cent of the money spent there by various mission boards went to communities where there was any denominational overlapping. Thus it was shown that the main problem upon such mission fields was "overlooking" the many communities where there are no religious services rather than "overlapping" by several churches in a community. Plans of comity are developing whereby the fields of work will be so divided that future overlapping will be reduced to a minimum, at least until all territory is well occupied. Through cooperation with city mission societies the Home Missions Council and its constituent bodies have helped these local organizations to cooperate interdenominationally in their respective communities. In more than one place, plans such as that which has been employed in Cleveland, Ohio, have been worked out whereby new churches are started only after interdenominational consideration and agreement. What has been accomplished promises still further adjustment in the future. Here then is a kind of unity that effects practical ends without eliminating denominations.

The cooperation in the field of so-called foreign missions is even more marked. Most outstanding and most comprehensive in its constituency of the various organizations thus unifying missionary work is the international and interdenominational movement which had its culmination, after half a century of periodical conferences, in the Ecumenical Missionary Conference which met in Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1910.³ The endeavors of the Conference are being carried out in a measure by the ³ A brief account of this movement may be found in "Christian Unity at Work," pp. 82f., published by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America.

Continuation Committee, which aims to make permanent contributions to the collective activities of foreign mission boards. One of the practical results of this Conference has been the organization of national boards of missionary education in this country and England, which are planning for the better training of missionaries. Another result has been the holding at Panama in 1916 the conference to consider religious and moral conditions in South America.

The efforts of this world organization are supplemented by those of interdenominational agencies in our own land. The Foreign Missions Conference of North America is a combination of representatives of foreign mission boards similar to the Home Missions Council and with a similar purpose for its own field. According to the annual report for 1914 there were included forty-eight societies or boards belonging to twenty different denominations, and, in addition to these, seventeen other societies with various affiliations, making in all sixty-five cooperating organizations. Still further related to this Conference, but extending also into the field of home missions, are three other movements. The Laymen's Missionary Movement started as a plea for foreign missions, but has now broadened so as to cover the whole field of missionary interest, and has the cooperation of practically all denominations interested in missionary work. The Missionary Education Movement is endeavoring to give the people of the various denominations adequate information about missionary activities and to enlarge missionary interest. The Student Volunteer Movement has for quite a long time been securing pledges from the young men and women in colleges to devote their lives to specific missionary service.⁴

The cooperation in the work of foreign missions extends beyond the societies and boards of the homeland to the mission fields themselves. The tendency of churches composed of natives on the foreign fields to unite is already manifest. Indeed, in South India the churches have organized the South India United Church, whose object is "to bind the churches together in one body with a view to developing a self-supporting, self-governing, and self-propagating Indian Church, which shall present a united living testimony to Christ, and worthily represent to the world the Christian ideal." The same tendency is to be marked in China. In India, China, Korea, Japan, and the Philippine Islands the churches have been brought together in interdenominational organizations while still maintaining their denominational affiliations. The spirit of unity is also manifest in the organizations and conferences of the missionaries themselves; in union educational efforts, such as "theological schools, medical schools, colleges, normal schools, schools for missionaries'

⁴ It is of interest to note here also that societies similar to that of the Foreign Missions Conference of North America have also been organized in Great Britain and Ireland and in Germany.

children, and, in fact, educational institutions, above the primary and intermediate grade, of every character"; and in interdenominational publication of hymn-books, Sunday School literature, and other religious periodicals.

These varied and extensive cooperative endeavors, excepting actual organic union, are supported in a large measure by the sympathetic attitude of the churches and missionary societies in the homeland. The report for 1912 of the Commission on Foreign Missions of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America says: "There has never been a time since the German Reformation when the various denominations were so closely engaged in cooperative measures for promoting the kingdom of Jesus Christ among the nations. There has never been a period since the beginning of modern missions when denominational differences were so minimized and the great fundamental truths of our blessed religion were so universally emphasized, and we advance together for the conquest of the world for Christ." This is a fair conclusion from the facts, and is even more justified now than when it was made.

To these cooperative activities in missionary concerns we may add those of evangelism. For many years now it has been possible to secure hearty cooperation from various denominations for evangelistic campaigns. These have had different forms. Most frequently they have been of the strictly revivalistic type, such as those of William Sunday, which are just now attracting such great attention. At other times there have been campaigns of simultaneous meetings under a general plan. A willing cooperation has characterized most of them. This cooperation has been sometimes that of an entire community and sometimes that of a section of some great city. In all such efforts Protestants have exemplified the willingness to unite in a definite piece of practical Christian work without any question of denominational aloofness or of the lack of denominational loyalty.

A still more striking indication of the ability of the adherents of different denominations to work together is cooperation in the same local church. Some real progress has been made in meeting the difficulties confronting small communities unable to support several churches of various denominations. At least four solutions have been tried with varying success. In some places it has been possible to persuade the people to give up their denominational connections and to join a church of the denomination of the strongest following. A different arrangement is that of the interdenominational church, wherein members retain their denominational affiliations, but unite in the single organization of their community. In such cases membership in the old home churches is maintained. Different from both of these is the "union church." Its members give up all denominational connection, and the church itself is unattached. In the multi-denominational or federated church two or more churches unite in using the same building as one congregation with one minister and act as a unit in all local affairs as a single church. Yet each of the constituent churches keeps its own organization within the composite church, and these separate and distinct organizations maintain their own denominational affiliations and activities. By this arrangement the advantages of cooperation are gained without losing denominational sympathy and help. This form of cooperation has been carried out in a number of places, perhaps most successfully in Massachusetts.

Of quite a different character is the cooperation in the field of philanthropy and social service. In some such organizations churches are constituent parts, but in most, Protestant individuals act as such, though in their action they often have the feeling that they are representing the churches. Practically all such organizations make appeals to the churches for support. Cooperation here has existed not only in local philanthropies, but also in some having wider spheres of activity.

The close cooperation of Protestant people and churches has been more marked in some of the movements of public reform, local, State, and national. Among numerous concerns in this field the abolition of the liquor traffic has commanded perhaps the greatest attention and unanimity of action.

The Anti-Saloon League has included representatives of various temperance organizations, but has worked a very great deal with and through the churches. There are other similar organizations. One of these is the International Bureau of Reform.

The cooperation thus far described has in every instance come into being primarily to take care of practical situations, and the emphasis on the principle of unity has been secondary if present at all. In the city, village, county, and State federations of churches we come to the second kind of Protestant cooperation. These federations seek to promote unity as well as to prosecute some of the joint tasks of the constituent churches. The federations of Wisconsin and Massachusetts are typical of State federations. The Federation of Massachusetts claimed, in 1914, to represent eighty-three per cent of the 448,682 Protestant church-members of Massachusetts. Good examples of city federations are those of New York, Baltimore, and St. Louis. Gradually the movement is spreading, and it is not too much to predict that in no distant time Protestants in most, if not all, communities will be organized to do the work which requires the activities of their combined resources.

But the greatest organization working directly for church unity as such is the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. On January 1, 1915, the constituent bodies sending representatives to this Council were thirty, with a combined membership of 17,436,650 communicants, which is considerably more than the claimed number of Romanist communicants in this country. The Council is doing its work through commissions and committees whose activities cover quite completely the vast field of church interests.⁵ Each of these commissions is seeking to coordinate the corresponding activities of denominational and interdenominational organizations and also to adjust itself to the same. Some of the commissions are going beyond adjustment and are making new proposals of cooperative work.

One of the newer fields into which the Council is pushing is that of social service. Already existing denominational agencies in this field are cooperating through the commission of the Council. In public morals too, the Council has exercised effective influence, as for example in connection with the moral conditions attending the San Francisco Exposition. In such public concerns as was represented in the Kenyon-Sheppard Interstate Liquor Shipment Bill the Council exerts its influence, and maintains at Washington an office through which it may quickly act. The Federal Council, along with the Home Missions Council, was instrumental in securing, after a ten years' campaign, the passage of a law which increased to an adequate number the chaplains of the national navy. Furthermore, "arrangements have been made with the Associated Press and the United Press by which" the Council "is securing larger publicity regarding the united work of the churches, and also for the general religious matters which are of general interest." These varied activities are but a suggestion of what the Council may do in unifying the Christian work of our land.⁶

⁵ These are the Commission on Evangelism, Commission on the Church and Social Service, Commission on Peace and Arbitration, Commission on Christian Education, Commission on Foreign Missions, Commission on Home Missions, Commission on Temperance, Commission on Family Life, Commission on Sunday Observance, Commission on the Church and Country Life, Commission on Federated Movements, Commission on State and Local Federations. In addition are several special committees dealing with matters of importance. These were, according to the report of 1915, Joint Commission on Theological Seminaries, Committee of One Hundred on the Panama-Pacific Exposition, American Church Committee on Peace Centenary, Committee on Relations with Japan, and Committee on Special Interest of the Colored Denominations.

The Council goes still further. It does not confine itself to the internal affairs. It has taken effective action in the field of international relations. In the controversy over the atrocities perpetrated in the Congo it used its influence. At the time of the presentation by President Taft of the arbitration treaty to Great Britain, the Council spoke wisely the opinion of the leaders of Protestantism in this country. Wide publicity was given to the statement. Two representatives of the Council were sent to Japan to study the Japanese situation and to give the Japanese people a correct impression of the attitude of Protestant America toward their nation. The results of this embassy have been gratifying. In the movement for permanent international peace the Council is working with other peace agencies. Some correspondence with leaders in other countries has been had with reference to international cooperation in religious affairs. The American section of the Evangelical Alliance⁷ has asked the Council to take charge in the future of the arrangements for the Week of Prayer. A definite proposal is now under consideration for the calling of a World Congress of the Churches which will aim to do for the entire church work what the Ecumenical Conference of Edinburgh did for missions. It is thus to be seen that whereas the accomplishments in unity made by the Federal Council are already considerable, the possibilities for further development are still greater.⁸

⁶ An additional contribution of the Council has been the creation and collection of literature bearing on Christian unity. See Annual Reports of the Executive Committee for 1913 (pp. 44f.) and for 1914 (pp. 64-67), and also C. S. MacFarland, "The Churches of the Federal Council," pp. 264-266.

The editor of one of the most influential and widely circulated journals of our country once said: "The Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America has supplanted no denomination, it has drawn no new creed, it has substituted for the present church organizations no new organization, nor has it caused one organization to absorb another. It has simply done for the Protestant churches of America what the Confederation did for the American colonies—it has bound them together, it has enabled them to work in union. . . The American States, when they were first federated, were as truly a nation as they are to-day. The Federal Council demonstrates the fact, not only that union is practicable, but also that it has been achieved.”

⁷ The Evangelical Alliance, a voluntary organization, is composed of individuals from various denominations, and has sections in different countries. It is another manifestation of cooperation of Protestants.

⁸ On May 8 and 9, 1917, the Council, assembled in special session at Washington, sent out to the churches a message concerning the duty of the church in the hour of grave national need.

In view of even this abbreviated presentation of the present cooperation among Protestants, it is amazing to hear uninformed people talk of the lack of solidarity and efficiency of Protestantism as compared with Romanism. In view of the statements of Romanist officials that they would now have thirty million more people than they now claim if they had kept all of their folks who have come to this country, it is futile to talk about the effectiveness of Romanist solidarity and organization. For certain ecclesiastical expressions of absolute authority Rome undoubtedly exceeds the solidarity of Protestantism. But in accomplishing the tasks of the kingdom, Romanism is a loose-jointed institution as compared with such a denominational organization as the Methodist Episcopal Church or the denominational missionary boards and societies, or some of the cooperative agencies discussed in this chapter. Perhaps the weakness of Romanism here is its failure to enlist the services of the laymen, a failure inherently connected with the belittling of laymen as compared with priests and with the absence of any controlling or even influential voice of the whole people in the affairs of the church.

The efficiency of Protestant cooperation hardly needs an apology. Protestantism does not possess and does not desire, but really opposes, the kind of solidarity which Rome possesses. In order to cooperate it does not need a uniformity of creed and ecclesiastical practice, which are at any rate unattainable for any branch of the church. The statistics of the really important denominations which, without great increases by immigration, have grown faster than the population, and the reports of missionary and publication organizations reveal the real efficiency of the several denominational organizations. The presentation in this chapter suggests the efficiency already attained in cooperation. The organized cooperation of Protestants in this country is not perfect nor complete, but it is effective and is constantly increasing in effectiveness.

Quiz

1. Are the divisions of Protestants inevitable, and why?
2. Has there been any tendency to unity?
3. What are the conclusions to be drawn from the development of the consciousness of unity?
4. What is the possible platform for cooperation?
5. What are some of the spheres in which cooperation has taken place?
6. What are some of the organizations which have carried on these cooperations?
7. What are church federations, and what is the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ?
- 8.

What are the constituency, aim, and results of the Federal Council? 9. How does Romanism and Protestantism compare in efficiency?

Suggestions for Further Study

1. The necessary steps in order to secure just one organization of all Protestant Christian bodies.
2. Protestant cooperation in your own community.
3. The relation of cooperation in your own community to social service and its organizations.
4. Is there any possibility of getting Romanists to cooperate with Protestants?
5. If not, why not?
6. If it is possible, in what sphere can it be brought about?

CHAPTER XII

THE PROSPECTS OF PROTESTANTISM

THE final question with reference to Protestantism as a positive religious force concerns its prospects for future permanency. Are the achievements of Protestantism to date a permanent contribution to Christianity? Is Protestantism to be absorbed or displaced? Cardinal Gibbons, in "The Faith of Our Fathers," makes a comparison of the prospects of Protestantism with what he regards as the outcome of the Arian movement. He refers to the fact that Arianism once had a large following, and included among its advocates and protectors some of the world's great men. In spite of this, the movement disappeared after enjoying a period of prosperity, and the one and only church came again into its own. Likewise, he thinks, Protestantism will disappear, and the Roman Church will be the only Christian church. However, this prophecy overlooks the facts that Arianism never was as deeply rooted in great world tendencies as Protestantism is, and that it has never really disappeared, for its doctrines have not been without their advocates from time to time during the centuries, and are still maintained by some sects. A prophecy entirely opposite to that of Cardinal Gibbons is warranted by the strength of Protestantism and its long successful history. Undoubtedly the church of Christ will go on as long as the world shall last, but the Romanist stamp will not be upon it. Protestantism has made a contribution which will not be lost, however much the Christian church may in the future be modified.

Two sources of increase in numbers in this country seem to convince some Romanists of a final triumph of Romanism. One of these is immigration. But in spite of the undoubted increases from this source, there is little ground for comfort for militant Romanists in considering immigration to this country. The immense losses admitted by Romanist officials must be very disquieting to them.¹ Nor can this immigration continue forever, since economic forces will tend sooner or later to a greater or less diminution of it, and the working of these forces may be greatly quickened by the results of the world war. Besides, the constant stream of Romanists coming to this country means numerical weakening to Romanism in Europe, and in the process absolute losses are sustained here. When these considerations are compared with such a fact as that Baptists, without the help of immigration, increased in this country during the last century three times as fast as the population, the statistical situation favors Protestantism rather than Rome.

¹ Protestants of the right temper can only regret that multitudes of immigrants are drifting, or have drifted already, entirely away from every type of Christian church. It is in part this regret which convinces Protestants that they are obligated to engage in religious ministry to these multitudes,

Nor does the supposedly relative larger size of Romanist families give any real assurance of numerical preponderance. In the absence of any conclusive evidence that would settle whether Romanist or Protestant families in this country are the larger, it may be noted that the birth-rate of Romanist France is notoriously low, and that as Romanists in this country become prosperous and educated their families tend to diminish in size, as is the case with people of other religious affiliations. The situation is certain to be further affected by the birth-control agitations. There are no known circumstances that point in the direction of the disappearance of Protestantism or even of the probable relative lessening of their numerical strength.

The external stability of Protestantism is shown clearly in its possession of vast material resources. Thomas Nixon Carver's book, "The Religion Worth While," argues that the very inculcation of Protestant ideas of frugality, industry, and individualism has led to the superior prosperity of Protestants. At least a measure of truth seems to inhere in this position. If it be held that this superiority has been the result of racial characteristics, it is then plain that Protestantism has been especially adequate as the religion of people who prosper. Possibly race and religion have been mutually influential. The fact of superiority remains. The statistics as to church property emphasize this as to Protestant possessions. According to the Census of 1906 the value of church property owned by Protestants was $46.14 per capita, while that of Romanists was only $22.22 per capita. Not only do Protestants own more church property per person, but they pay better for what they do own. The indebtedness on Protestant church property was only $2.13 per capita as against $4.09 per capita on Romanist property, and was only 5.7 per cent of the entire value of the church property as against the Romanist 16.9 per cent of the entire value. Moreover, the great bulk of the industries of this country are owned and controlled by Protestants. So far, then, as material resources mean strength for ecclesiastical work, the Protestants have the greater strength, and there is little indication of their diminution.

Protestants are in possession too, of the most influential institutions which make for the molding of future thought and life in this country, especially educational institutions. The greater number and most influential of these are either Protestant or non-Romanist. In the West and middle West education tends to come predominantly into the hands of the States, and so to be officially without religious affiliations. Again, Roman Catholic students do not always avail themselves of their own institutions' privileges, but elect to attend non-Romanist schools and universities. The effect of this situation will be inevitable in view of the fact that the greater contribution to the scientific and intellectual world of the last three centuries has been made by Protestant minds, and has been in closer harmony with Protestant than with Romanist principles. Not only does the control of the higher education by Protestants promise permanency for Protestant ideas among the leaders of this country, but it seems to indicate that not a few Romanist young men and women will in some measure imbibe these ideas with results that may be easily imagined and which may already be marked by a little acquaintance with such people.

At the basis of these possessions has been the power of Protestants to achieve. No one should desire to deny the part which Romanists have undoubtedly had in the development of this country. But Protestants have shown indubitably a superior accomplishing power. At one time in the past² it looked as if this continent was to be held and developed for Rome. Two great Romanist empires were projected with the most ambitious ends. In the south and southwest the Spanish Empire was endeavoring to build up a vast civilization in the name of Rome and to the advantage of Romanists. In the north and northwest another Romanist power, France, was endeavoring with the most brilliant imagination and forecast to implant a new French empire, which was also to be Romanist. No greater political powers than these two European empires existed in the world at that time. All seemed propitious for the vast undertakings. But these dreams of empire went glimmering before the power of England and her colonists, and before some other Protestant folk in this land. Certainly no such opportunity as then existed for the settlement and development and control of this vast continent is now possessed by adherents of Rome. So far as one can see no such opportunity will ever return. The failure of Romanism in the past argues no surer success in the future. The innate power of Protestantism to maintain itself and to move on in achieving progress shows no alarming signs of abatement. Rather, it gives assurance of the permanency of Protestantism.

² See L. W. Bacon, "History of American Christianity."

This conclusion is strengthened by a quite additional and even more significant set of considerations. These pertain to the mutual agreement between Protestant and modern conceptions and forces. One of these conceptions is that of freedom. It is the very essence of Rome's genius, which runs always to an absolute external authority that must be unquestioningly accepted in all matters, to be opposed to freedom. In contrast, it is of the very essence of Protestantism to demand freedom and to promote it. In this it agrees without doubt with the characteristic drift of modern life and institutions. Freedom is the breath of life for the modern world. By this freedom the advance in modern times has been made possible. Unless the world is to turn backward the hands of progress, freedom will continue. In that case the form of Christianity, whose very essence is of freedom, will prosper and abide.

Closely connected with freedom, democracy has made steady advance in the modern world. For the time being the European war may seem to give pause to the rule of the people. Yet some elements of the situation point strongly to an increase in democracy after the war. It will be difficult at any rate to convince the people of this country that democracy is only a passing phase of human development. Here at least democracy is certainly dominant and will remain so. Nor can it be confined to political institutions and life. It will find expression in the sphere of religion and church government in the future as in the past. In the Roman Church the people have no voice or vote, and the priests and officials are in no way answerable to the people and removable by them. Pius X only recently declared that a pernicious doctrine which would make the laity a factor in the progress of the church.³ Consequently, if democracy is really one of the permanent trends of human development which is to affect not only political, but also religious institutions, Protestantism, with its democracy of spirit and church government, has better prospects of permanency.

³ See Newman Smyth, "Passing Protestantism," p. 51.

A similar conclusion is to be drawn from the mutual relationship existing between Protestantism and the development of modern science. Scientific methods of thought dominate the modern intellectual world. It is as likely that the sun will cease to shine as that the contribution of science to the ways of men's thinking will be utterly given up by the world. This development of science has been in part a development of itself, and yet Protestantism has had some share in it. Science could never have possessed the freedom to work unrestrictedly without the accomplishment of religious freedom by Protestantism, since at one time all learning was in the control of the church. Sufficient was said above of the relation of Rome to free research and thought to show how essentially antagonistic Romanism and free study and formulation of truth are. The spirit of Romanism and the spirit of modern science are utterly incompatible. The surreptitious manner of the dropping from the Index of the strictures upon the Copernican theory is an indication of the true spirit of Rome in dealing with science which does not please her, but which she can no longer profitably oppose. But as in the case of modern freedom and democracy so in that of modern science, Protestantism is close to the heart of the development of humanity, and consequently possesses real ground for permanency.

Turning from the harmony of Protestantism with the modern Western world to its contact with the heathen peoples, strong reason for assurance still abides. Protestantism has the larger prospect for influencing the whole world. Her missionary enterprises are the stronger. Measured by the funds specifically given for these enterprises, by the rate of increase of communicants in recent decades, by the general influence in various countries which, unlike Rome's, is non-political and thus recognized as disinterested, by the educational service rendered, and by their medical and other social ministry, Protestant missions are in the lead. Protestantism has abundantly demonstrated its power to propagate itself among non-Christian peoples.

The Western world is greatly influencing with its civilization the whole earth. The Orient may make its contribution to the West, but the East has already, as for example Japan, been absorbing the Western way of thinking and life, and the whole world will undoubtedly be profoundly affected by Occidental civilization. In the certain development it is inevitable that the free, democratic, scientific modernism of the Western world will be an outstanding feature of future Oriental civilization. These elements are altogether likely to be accepted universally earlier than any type of Christianity. After these features have been more or less widely accepted, the type of Christianity which will appeal and satisfy is the type which is in closest harmony with the institutions and methods of thought of free, democratic, scientific modernism. In such a situation Protestantism without any question is in a better position than Romanism. It may be concluded that Protestantism has excellent prospects of being ultimately the type of Christianity most acceptable to the heathen world and of establishing itself permanently in non-Christian lands.

In contrast to Protestantism as it faces with assurance the modern world, is Romanism with its many defections. It is not necessary to point out again the great losses among immigrants who come to this country. There are also many native-born people now members of Protestant churches who were once Romanists. In each of the several churches which the present writer has served as pastor some former Romanists were members. He has himself baptized some converted Romanists. Probably few Protestant churches lack some converts from Romanism, and consequently the entire number of such converts is large. There are also native-born Romanists who have dropped out of Romanism, but have joined no other church. These defections in this country are more than paralleled in Europe, whence comes the chief increase to the Roman Church in America. For some time an exodus from the Roman Church has been proceeding, and many of the seceders have become Protestants.⁴ The same general drift is shown in this country in those Protestant churches which are made up of non-English-speaking people who came to this country as Romanists, as, for example, the Italian Baptist churches. These defections certainly do not show a decline of Protestantism, but rather a decline of Romanism.

⁴ For some examples, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 26. For a full statement of the European situation, at least as it was before the war, see Loeppert, "Modernism and the Vatican," and Bain, "The New Reformation."

This is not the whole of the situation nor the more hopeful part of it. Not only has Rome suffered from defections, but there are some internal movements of reform. Sooner or later modern science and thought were bound to influence the multitudes of honest, serious priests. The inevitably resulting movement within the church has been designated by Pope Pius himself as "Modernism." As rapidly as the books of the Modernists are prohibited others are written and published. The similarities between the views of Modernists and Protestants are marked. Newman Smyth describes the Modernists in a summarized way thus:⁵ "When we put together from their various writings their objects which from their several points of view they desire to see accomplished, the list of their aims reaches considerable proportions. The transformation and purification of the government and administration of the Church; reduction of the number of Italian cardinals, and an increase of foreign cardinals in the government at Rome; decentralizing the pontifical power, changing the papacy from a too monarchical into a more constitutional rule; abandonment of its bad systems of coercion; restoration of the autonomy of the Episcopate; publicity of trials, responsibility for decisions; reforms in the studies in the seminaries, and education of the clergy to meet modern demands; participation of the laity in the government of the Church; changes in the Congregation of the Index and other councils of the Vatican; decrease in the external devotions, and a spiritual renovation of the ceremonials; removal of corruptions; a priesthood better trained in modern ideas and fitted for social service; and to some extent the modifying of enforced celibacy; these, and other measures of renovation and progress in response to the needs of modern life, besides their demands for liberty to pursue critical, historical, and scientific studies within the Church, and the right to remake theological interpretations of the facts and faiths of Christianity, constitute a sufficiently extensive prospect of innovation to justify the apparent panic of the Encyclical."

⁵ See "Passing Protestantism," pp. 106f.; also Loeppert.

This encyclical is the letter of Pope Pius X attacking "Modernism." It attempted to stop honest thinking and was supplemented by a requirement for every priest and teacher to take the oath against "Modernism." The result of this attempt has been far from successful from a Romanist point of view. Many priests in France took the oath under duress, and then wrote their bishops anonymously that they had no intention of keeping it.⁶ In Germany teachers in Romanist institutions could not be compelled to take the oath against their own desire, because the German government controlled their pay, and would not countenance any coercion. Men outside of Romanism hope that the Modernists will stay within the church in order gradually to effect a change.

⁶ See Loeppert.

Modernism has not yet had much effect in this country, perhaps because the priests here have been too much occupied with the practical affairs of the church to pay a great deal of attention to intellectual questions. But if Modernism is not yet strong, "Americanism" is. This is a term applied to the spirit and utterances and aims of certain American prelates whose position has shown the inevitable influence of modern American ideas. These ideas are markedly the possession of many of the laity. The opposition of many laymen in this country to the parochial school and their preference for the public school, the insistence of many people upon obtaining a voice in the government of the church, the friendly recognition by Romanists of Protestants and their churches as Christian in spite of the official teaching of Romanism, and the appreciation and espousal of American ideals and principles by great numbers of Romanists are some of the indications of how far Romanist priests and laymen in this country have grown from medieval Romanism.⁷

⁷ For the effect of liberal studies upon a priest of open mind, see larger edition, Appendix, Note 27.

In view of these facts, it is plain that Rome's hope for permanency lies in strengthening the tendencies of modern thinking. If the number of Modernists becomes sufficiently great, a result far from impossible, Rome may find it necessary to change as she has done in the past. From one point of view the doctrine of the infallibility of the pope may seem a barrier, but it may turn out to be the very agency which will facilitate the necessary changes to save Romanism from extinction or relegation to the realm of the ignorant. It is inconceivable that Romanism will abide just as it is. The adjustment to modern life is bound to be forced in some way and bound to come in some measure. Human life develops, and in the long run the development cannot be stopped. Institutions which get in the way of the progress perish. Rome will not be willing to perish. She will be more willing to change in spite of her claim to unchangeability. In view of the nature of the modern world and of the relation thereto of Protestantism, we must conclude that the change will come in the direction which modern progressive Protestantism has taken.⁸

Some people are discussing the possibility of a drawing together of Protestantism and Romanism and the point of contact in such a rapprochement.

⁸ It is a striking fact that Pius X's attack on Modernism acknowledges and emphasizes the fact that Modernist scholars, who profess to be loyal Roman Catholics, are in close agreement with the scholars of the Protestant world.

The only platform upon which there can ever be harmony between these two branches of the church is the platform upon which Protestants among themselves are now cooperating, the platform of freedom of theological opinion and ecclesiastical practices with cooperation in practical endeavors. In the realm of social service cooperation has already been secured in some instances and in some measure. A larger cooperation is possible except where Romanism by its official commands prevents. So long as Rome regards herself as the only Christian church and refuses to look upon or treat other Christian bodies and people as Christian, there can, of course, be no cooperation. Not all of the bitterness and bigotry are on one side, but it is a simple fact that Romanist priests and Romanist people are prevented by ecclesiastical authority from cooperation with Protestants, and especially if by any stretch of the imagination the cooperation can be connected with religious or ecclesiastical recognition. If the Roman hierarchy would show any fraternal attitude toward Protestantism, it would find a warm response on the part of a great many Protestant ministers and people. A beginning could be made in matters of social service, and it is safe to say that if cooperation can be had here, the mere cooperation with its attendant mingling and fellowship will be bound to develop closer relationship and mutual regard. Protestantism does not fear the loss of its influence or permanency by following such a suggestion. Can Romanism come to the same point of view?

Protestants can afford to cherish fraternity even though Romanism does not now reciprocate. To be sure, if official Romanism becomes aggressive, as some things in this country seem to indicate is the present tendency, Protestantism will be aroused to a correspondingly aggressive propaganda. If official Romanism or individual Romanists set out to secure control of this country in the name of Romanism or seem to attack any of the social or political institutions connected with freedom, especially religious freedom, even though the attack is only a short step toward encroachment, Protestantism will be aroused to protect itself and its institutions and to secure for every one the blessing of religious liberty. Nor will it be deterred by the cry of those who first raise an agitation by their own aggressiveness, and then when that has begotten a like aggressiveness on the part of Protestants, declare that they are being persecuted for their religion. Protestants may hope, just as Romanists may hope, that the better leadership and the better spirit in both wings of the church will dominate and avoid any undue aggressiveness on either side. Meanwhile Protestants have good ground for resting assured in their convictions and for going about their tasks with vigor and consecration. The permanency of Protestantism is not really menaced even were it verbally threatened as is sometimes reported.

Protestants need have no fear as they face the future. They may be assured of the worth and scripturalness of those principles for which Protestantism stands. They may be certain that their principles are in accord with the developments of the modern world and with what the world seems about to become. Their past achievements have been great. They already possess great numbers, resources, and strength; they have learned in a large measure how to cooperate among themselves; and they seem to be growing stronger persistently both in this and non-Christian lands. In view of the signs of decaying medieval Romanism, they do not need to be concerned for the permanence of Protestantism. They may hope for such a modernization of Romanism as will make possible at least some kind of Christian cooperation such as now characterizes the relations of the several Protestant bodies.

Quiz

1. What is the prediction of Romanists as to the permanence of Protestantism? 2. What is the significance of the discussion of the outcome of immigration and the size of families? 3. Which branch of the church in this country possesses the greatest material resources? 4. Which controls the institutions for molding public opinion? 5. What is the evidence of the power of Protestantism to achieve? 6. What is the significance for permanence of the respective relations of Protestantism and Romanism to the modern forces of freedom, democracy, and science? 7. What has been the respective influence of Protestantism and Romanism upon the heathen world? 8. What is the situation among European Romanists, both as to defections and as to internal revolt by the Modernists? 9. What are the facts in these respects as to our country? 10. Can Romanism be changed? 11. What is the relative assurance which Romanists and Protestants may feel as to permanence?

Suggestions for Further Study

1. The reasons why Romanists think Protestantism will disappear.
2. The rates of increase respectively of Protestants and Romanists.
3. The probable effect of the world war upon immigration from Romanist countries.
4. The effect upon such immigration of the recently enacted literacy test.
5. The justifiableness of the work by Protestants among Romanists in this land.
6. Means by which fraternity between Protestants and Romanists may be secured.
7. Evidences that Rome can change.
8. Importance to the welfare of the country of mutual toleration and even of fraternity of Protestants and Romanists.
9. The incongruities of Romanism and American institutions and ideals.

BOOK-LIST FOR REFERENCE AND STUDY

GENERAL

In addition to general encyclopedias and general church histories these works should be consulted for further study.

The Catholic Encyclopedia.

The New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge.

Bacon, L. W.: "History of American Christianity."

Cavanagh, Wm. Henry: "The Word Protestant in Literature, History, and Legislation."

Gale, Frank H.: "The Story of Protestantism."

Hatch, Edwin: "The Organization of the Early Christian Church."

Lindsay, Thomas M.: "History of the Reformation."
2 vols.

Lindsay, Thomas M.: "Martin Luther."

Newman, A. H.: "History of Anti-Pedobaptism."

Vedder, Henry C.: "A Short History of the Baptists."

Vedder, Henry C.: "The Reformation in Germany."

PART I

Bousset, Wm.: "The Faith of a Modern Protestant."

Coppens, Charles, S. J.: "A Systematic Study of the Catholic Religion." Second Edition.

Dorner, Isaac A.: "History of the Protestant Theology."
2 vols.

Foster, Frank Hugh: "The Fundamental Ideas of the Roman Catholic Church."

Gibbons, James (Cardinal): "The Faith of Our Fathers."

Grounds of the Catholic Doctrine, Confession of Faith, published by Pope Pius IV.

Von Hase, Carl A.: "Handbook to the Controversy with Rome."

Hill, M. P.: "The Catholic's Ready Answer."

McGiffert, A. C.: "Protestant Thought Before Kant."

McKim, R. H.: "Romanism in the Light of History."

Miller, Robert J.: "The Fundamentals of Protestantism."

Moehler, John Adam: "Symbolism of Doctrinal Differences Between Catholics and Protestants." Translated by James Burton Robertson.

Pfleiderer, Otto: "The Development of Theology in Germany since Kant."

PART II

Annual Reports of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, 1912, 1913, 1914, 1915.

Annual Report of the Foreign Missions Conference of North America, 1914.

Annual Report of the Home Missions Council, 1915.

Ashworth, R. A.: "The Union of Christian Forces."

Carroll, H. K.: "The Religious Forces of the U. S."

Bain, John A.: "The New Reformation."

Harnack, Adolph: "Thoughts on the Present Position of Protestantism."

Loeppert, Wm.: "Modernism and the Vatican."

MacFarland, Charles S.: "Christian Unity at Work."

MacFarland, C. S.: "The Churches of the Federal Council."

Smyth, Newman: "Passing Protestantism and Coming Catholicism."

Troeltsch, Ernest: "Protestantism and Progress."

U. S. Census, Special Report: "Religious Bodies," 1906, Parts I and II.

Usher, Edward P.: "Protestantism, A Study in the Direction of Religious Truth and Christian Unity."

Deacidified using the Bookkeeper process.
Neutralizing agent: Magnesium Oxide
Treatment Date: March 2006

PreservationTechnologies

A WORLD LEADER IN PAPER PRESERVATION

111 Thomson Park Drive
Cranberry Township, PA 16066
(724) 779-2111

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

0 017 445 739 6